Weiland

ville, Beresford, Canton and Alcester.

"A lot of this work is walking up and down the main streets and talking to shoppers and storefront owners, and then we're having our meetings," Weiland said. "When people run for government, run for Congress, run for the United States Senate, because of these extensive campaigns, they have to raise millions of dollars. ... Where's the money coming from? Why does General Electric pay very little in taxes and have 600 tax attorneys on its payroll working the halls of Capitol Hill?"

During Thursday's meeting, Weiland also addressed the issues of healthcare, maintaining a highway program in South Dakota, alternative energy and a national energy policy, ethanol and Big Oil, student loans and reforming the tax code.

Weiland said he is receiving push-back on the Affordable Care Act and knows it's not perfect. But he said he does like the fact that young adults can stay on their family's health insurance policy until they are age 26.

He also likes the fact that pre-existing conditions can no longer be used to deny health insurance coverage, along with the fact that lifetime caps have been lifted on medical expenses.

His main concern, he said, lies in the number of people who do not have insurance.

"At times, we've had anywhere between 40 and 50 million people in this country without healthcare," Weiland said. "They still get sick, and when they get sick they end up going to the emergency room."

"When you go to the emergency room, that's the most expensive healthcare you can use and not pay for. When you are going into the emergency room because you don't have any insurance, and you're getting healthcare and you're not paying for it, what's the hospital going to do? They're going to pass it on.

"That's really unfair to all of us who have private insurance. That happens all the time. We have to figure out how to take care of those folks in the middle."

Weiland also suggested allowing more people to buy into the Medicare program to aid with the nation's healthcare problems.

"You're going to pay with Obamacare, you're going to have to pay an insurance company a premium, or you could have it taken out of your check and have the same healthcare that 65-70 of the people in this room have. What would be so bad about that?" he asked the Yankton audience.

"Big insurance didn't want that to happen. There's no money in that. They want to insure young people, because they don't get sick, and that's how the Affordable Care Act works. You have to get everybody into the system ..."

After the meeting, Weiland provided his stand on issues surrounding the Second Amendment.

"The only thing I'm really supportive of is the background checks for criminality and mental illness. I think that's reasonable," he said. "I like to hunt, and I wouldn't support anything trying to take people's guns away, but there are a lot of gun laws that we need to better enforce."

Weiland referred to a past experience shaping his views on gun ownership.

"In the '90s, I thought the assault rifle ban was reasonable, but what we found out is that it didn't take much from the manufacturers to change the specifications of the weapons, and then (the guns) were legal again," he said.

"I don't think that's the way we're going to stop gun violence. There's a lot of education that needs to be done, and we need to make sure certain individuals don't have easy access to weapons."

Weiland pointed to his bipartisan experience as a regional director for the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), which he said would help him work with Republicans in the U.S. Senate.

"I worked with six Republican governors while I was working with FEMA," Weiland said. "Disaster knows no party. That job was about helping people. We need to work with the other side, and big money cannot be the incentive."

"This state needs a two-party system. Our ideas need to be challenged. I don't have a monopoly on the truth or the best ideas. I don't have all the solutions, and I'm looking forward to a good give-and-take for this campaign."

"I'd like to think that we've got a real opportunity through this campaign, even on the other side, to try to talk about this whole idea of what big money is doing to our government and our country."

Ultimately, Weiland said his devotion will be to the people of South Dakota and not to big business or special interests.

"I need to be accountable to the people of South Dakota," he said. "If the people who come to me fall into the category of big business or special interest, there's the door. If we can get big money out of politics, they aren't going to have that access."

"That's why this grass roots campaign is so important at this time in our political system. We need to get back to the grass roots. We need to have more meetings like this. This will make a difference."

ON THIS DATE

75 YEARS AGO

Tuesday, July 19, 1938

- Gottfried Dreismeier, farmer residing one half mile west of Crofton lost eighteen head of hogs ranging in weight from 70 to 200 pounds each and several were sick. The loss was attributed to either eating cockle burrs or old buttermilk which has been placed in a galvanized barrel. Harry Nohr farmer five miles northwest of Crofton recently lost two hogs each weighing 200 pounds after feeding old buttermilk.
- Little more than 100 years ago, people had a difficult time finding out what was happening elsewhere in the world - even in other parts of their own state. This unbelievable condition existed because there was no means of transmitting information. There were few daily newspapers. The word "Reporter" had not come into usage.
