Officers To Get New Tool For Child Abuse Cases

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Nebraska law enforcement agencies are slated to get another training tool to help officers who are working on child abuse cases, Attorney General Doug Peterson announced Wednesday.

An eight-part DVD series will provide instructions on how to handle reported cases of child abuse. The DVDs and training manuals are aimed at new officers, with lessons such as the proper way to gather evidence and interview children.

The series also discusses the role of Nebraska's child advocacy centers and protective services hotline.

The packages will likely be distributed to local law enforcement agencies by mid-August. Each DVD runs from 20 to 40 minutes long, said Carol Stitt, a child welfare consultant for the League of Nebraska Municipalities.

Peterson said the materials are intended for officers who have been hired but not yet completed all of their formal training at the state law enforcement academy. He said it's important that officers know how to interact with young victims who are usually frightened and unfamiliar with officers.

"If that officer is hired tomorrow, the thought was that we need to get this into their hands as quickly as possible," he said.

The project is a joint effort of law enforcement groups, municipalities and the Nebraska Department of Health and Human Services.

Peterson said representatives from his office plan to travel the state to host regional training sessions for law enforcement departments.

year. He added that while it makes only a small dent in the current situation, it's a beginning point.

"We can start doing something," he said. "Right now, our budget is short in the highway and bridge department by about $1.4 million. This will allow us to take on the bridges that we need to take care of. We're going to have to start, in the years following, prioritizing bridges, roads and what gets done in alternating years because $1.5 million will allow us to do roughly about seven miles of asphalt per year in today's dollars, but that doesn't talk about when the Fleg's Bridge gets replaced. That's roughly a $5 million-$10 million price tag and a couple years old."

Woods said one of the only alternatives beyond the levy was additions to the existing wheel tax, and the commission was not willing to go forward with this. "We have one other option — we can add the wheel tax to $5 per tire, maximum 12 tires," he said. "We don't feel that's appropriate doing that right now with the excise tax increasing on vehicles. We figure this is the best way we can get some stuff done on our roads. If we have to increase the wheel tax, I want to really study that if we have to do that. Right now, I don't think that's something we should do. I think that's just too much of a burden on the taxpayers."

Two Yankton County residents were on hand at Wednesday's meetings to express their concerns.

Greg Loest said he was concerned with the broad scope of what kinds of roadway projects that could be addressed with the funds raised from a levy.

"I drive on these roads, too, and I'm willing to pay taxes in order to drive on the roads," Loest said. "What I'm not willing to do is sit there and fund for expansion of a corridor or the expansion of new culverts that are wider than what's necessary that's not replacement in-kind."

Jake Cutts said he'd like to see a time-limit placed on any proposed levy so it can be reconsidered in the future.

"I don't like to see it as an open-ended tax increase," Cutts said. "If we're going to do such-and-such, and it's going to cost x-amount of dollars, this levy should be for 10 years, five years, whatever we say that's going to cost."

Woods said there's uncertainty as to when or if they'll be able to roll back the levy and still be able to pay for roads.

"It seems like the highway funding gets smaller and smaller," he said. "The federal highway trust fund is on the verge of being broke. ... I don't know if this levy can go away, but if it can, fantastic."

support for the arts by dedicating a portion of the state's tourism tax to the South Dakota Arts Council — a first in all of the country's 50 states — and having the arts used in state veteran's homes to help them cope with behavioral health issues.

"There's some amazing people with phenomenal gifts that really come to life in the health care environment," Michels said. "They are able to talk about their experiences by either drawing or dialoguing them."

Michael Pangburn, director of the South Dakota Arts Council, witnessed Michels' dedication to the arts and had him nominated for the award.

"Americans for the Arts always tries to find somebody each year that has done a good job in promoting the arts among state government officials," said Pangburn. "Matt and Gov. (Dennis) Daugaard have been very supportive of the Arts Council by making sure we have a dedicated revenue source."

Michels' art appreciation began through his grandmother, a painter who was friends with Native American artist Oscar Howe.

"I remember Howe and his amazing gifts and all the people he inspired," Michels said. "He was one of the first people to do designs of the Corn Palace in Mitchell, and as a little boy, my mom took me there. We can get so much out of artists in a lot of ways."

Michels' art passion did not go unnoticed by Jay Dick, the senior director of State and Local Government Affairs at Americans for the Arts.

"He (Michels) was nominated for helping to protect and use the South Dakota tourism promotion tax to fund the state arts, and is a spokesperson for arts and healthcare," said Dick. "This is a growing topic around the nation, for using art therapists for veterans coming home with PTSD or for children going through scary hospital procedures. Matt is a wonderful supporter of that and he represents South Dakota very well."

Despite claiming to not have any artistic ability himself, Michels finds time to pause and admire the artwork created by others, like the sculptures in downtown Yankton and the paintings displayed in Bede Hall at Mount Marty College.

"The state capitol is really a living museum of art from our past and present," he said. "The art adds so much, not only to the experience, but it also puts context and texture as to why we're here on earth: to serve others."

Renovation Of Scottsbluff High School in Nebraska Begins

SCOTTSBLUFF, Neb. (AP) — Renovation of Scottsbluff High School in western Nebraska has begun.

The Scottsbluff Star-Herald reports that members of the architecture firm and school facilities team reported the project's progress to the public school board on Monday.

Construction will take place over the next 2 1/2 years. There will be a gradual progress of renovation that will allow for more flexibility for the contractors and accommodate school operations.

Randy Scott, director of the district's facilities and maintenance, says 80 percent of the school will be new or heavily remodeled when the project is complete. Some of the additions include a new media center, commons area, career center and classrooms that will be based on the needs of the different areas of Career Academy courses.

they see the process and the hundreds of man hours that go into each comic."

For youth services librarian Joyce Moore, inviting Williams and Gapstur made sense. Complementing the library's summer reading program superhero theme, "Every Hero has a Story" and "Unmask the Reader in You," the pair also taught area youth about the process of creating what stocks the library's shelves.

"I think so often, (the kids) don't even think about where all of these books and items in the library come from — that it actually was somebody's idea, talent and creativity that made it happen," she said. "I think by having real people come in and share that experience with them will be eye-opening and, hopefully, inspiring for the kids to try their hand at drawing or writing."

Gastrap and Williams both agreed that the process of making a comic book is often times overlooked or unknown. They began explaining the process of producing a comic by informing the youth that it is a collaborative project with many intricate steps.

Essential to a comic book is an initial idea conjured up by an editor, who then shares his or her vision with an author and hires them to begin producing a script.

The script is a very detailed description of every word and visual that will be printed on the page. Comic book scripts are longer than the final printed page, according to Williams.

The next step — storytelling — is when Gapstur would begin his contribution.

"Storytelling is taking the writer's vision and choosing the best way to communicate that with images," he said. A penciller and inker finish the sketches before they're sent off for color, which is oftentimes completed electronically.

Finally, a letterer adds word balloons and the comic is ready for publication.

"Each step builds and improves on the stop before it," Williams said.

For both Gapstur and Williams, creating comic books as a full-time career was never what they imagined they'd be doing.

Gastrap began illustrating comics as a hobby in 2009 and spent more than five years developing a portfolio before he was able to continue with the career full-time.

Williams began in the film and television industry before beginning his career as an author of novels and comic books in 2010.

He said he was unsure he was fit for the business before realizing what a collaborative effort it is.

"Before I got into comics professionally, there was very much this, 'Oh my gosh, I'm going to have to learn all these different things in order to succeed.' You don't, but you have to be great at what you do do," he said.

The pair hoped their presentation would inspire kids to begin illustrating and writing their own comics.

"I would encourage anyone who wants to make comics to just go ahead and do it," Gapstur said. "Make it for yourself, parents or friends — just make them, because that's the best way to learn."

Following their 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. presentations, Gastrap and Williams illustrated and autographed personalized sketches of kids' favorite comic book characters.

Area teens will be given the opportunity to create a comic book at 3 p.m. Saturday at the Yankton Community Library.
