HAY

Hay Farms near Gayville, were lucky to get their first cutting of hay finished in early June. They work on a 28-day rotation, using the weeks in between cuttings to plant corn and beans.

While the 28-day mark for the second cutting is approaching, Freeburg hopes the weather is cool and dry, despite what June and July weather typically brings.

"Normally we will get four cuttings off all our fields, and because we started as early as we did, there's no reason we shouldn't get that crop," Freeburg said. "For a lot of farmers who didn't get in there and get started, they might not get that last crop. They might only get two to three cuttings at the most."

Still, farmers like Freeburg and Van Gerpen are worried about their crops in lower areas that have been plagued by standing water.

"We've got standing water in spots that most generally you never see it," Van Gerpen said. "Five inches over a three- or four-day period has got to be pretty rare."

The biggest problem of an overly wet year, both farmers said, is the long-term effects. Alfalfa hay, a perennial crop, is planted in the same field for four or five years. Rain damage one year will affect the field's production capabilities every year after that.

Heavy equipment and machinery driving on the wet fields creates problems later on, too.

"Wherever there's wheel tracks from semis or heavy equipment, grass wants to come up in those areas," Freeburg said. "It's a challenge."

All those problems contribute to the overall hay quality.

Without bright and sunny days, the quality of the hay is at risk. Dairy farmers especially are looking for the best quality of hay because their milk production depends on it, Freeburg said.

"I project production will be up, and the quality will be down," Van Gerpen said, "but that can all change."

"Grass in town dries up quickly, and people think it's the same in the country," Freeburg said. "All you have to do is drive over to the Gayville, Volin, Meckling and Mission Hill area. That's where your ground water table is and it's very high. It's been high all spring and it's going to take a while for that water to go down."

PRISON

fiscal year. There are fewer parole violators among the men, but more first-time offenders.

The average length of stay — 14 months for women and 20 months for men — is changed little from a year ago.

A May report showed that 38 percent of the inmates convicted of violent crimes were in prison for rape or aggravated assault. For nonviolent crimes, the largest percentage of inmates (12 percent) were there for possession of a controlled substance.

Bartling, D-Burke, said it's important that the state continue to fund Corrections Department programs to provide education or General Educational Development (GED) classes to inmates.

"That's an area that I think money could be very well spent, and just continuing some educational opportunities. ... I'm a firm believer all the way around that a good education is a very strong part of a person's life and ability to make good for themselves and their families" she said.

Part of the reason for a leveling off in the prison count is a state population that is growing older. Young people are most often those at risk to commit crimes, Feiler said.

Programs that target an inmate's specific needs, such as ending methamphetamine use, also are helping, she said.

Gov. Mike Rounds has created the Re-entry Council to look for ways to keep released inmates from committing another crime. The state's recidivism, or re-offending rate, is 30 percent.

Feiler said the DOC might relax some policies if that can help minimize parole violations. For example, it might be better for some parolees to have family support and be without a job than to require that they have both a place to live and a job, she said.

The number of parolees will average 2,800 this fiscal year.

OHS Slams Brakes On Texting And Driving

PIERRE — Twenty-three times more likely to be in a crash or near-crash. According to a study by the Virginia Tech Transportation Institute, those are your odds if you send text messages while driving.

And a study by Car and Driver magazine shows it takes drivers 70 feet to hit the brakes when sending a text message, compared to 4 feet when legally drunk. Findings like these are prompting the South Dakota Office of Highway Safety <<http://sopr-optout.com/Url.aspx?514891x822680x-798940>> to take action in hopes of reducing distracted driving in the state.

The office has developed a public service announcement to raise awareness of the dangers of texting and driving <<http://sopr-optout.com/Url.aspx?514891x822679x-1315035>>. The 30-second television spot confronts viewers with the risk they pose not only to themselves, but also to others when texting while driving.

"The ultimate goal of the texting while driving spot is to keep South Dakota's drivers and roadways safe," says Lee Axdah, director of the Office of Highway Safety. "We want to educate the public about this dangerous, deadly habit. Sending a quick text message may seem inconsequential, but taking your eyes off the road, even for a few seconds to send a short message, could cost a life."

The television spot entitled "Texting and Driving. Save a Life. Save it for L&R" will start playing on television stations across South Dakota the week of June 21.
