State

Simply put: No.
 "It's Mother Nature that's bringing this upon us. Not man," the governor said.

As of May 1, Corps data indicated that all reservoir levels were normal, Daugaard said. However, snow continues to accumulate in the Rocky Mountains and rainfall up-river has been much higher over the past two weeks.

"There were parts of the Black Hills that got 10 inches of rain. There were parts of Montana that got 15 inches of rain," Daugaard said. "Ten and a half million acre feet of water fell. That means 10 1/2 acres of land covered by a foot (of water). That's how much rain fell in about two weeks."

That's 130-140 percent above average, he said.

Added to this, the snowpack in Montana has not melted to any great degree.

"I talked to (Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer) yesterday, and he said, 'The Yellowstone River in Montana normally peaks its flow the second week of June. It's been out of its banks for two weeks, and the snowpack hasn't even started yet,'" Daugaard said.

As a result, the reservoirs are now full.

"The Oahe reservoir is about a foot from the top," Daugaard said. "I think it's less than a foot from the top. If it's windy, it blows over the spillway."

The governor inspected the levees in Pierre/Fort Pierre before he left for Vermillion Friday morning, and said they're looking good.

"We're in very good shape in terms of elevation, and the water won't get to 150 for another week, so I would say a day or two we'll be done everywhere in Pierre and Fort Pierre," he said. "As the contractor realized that they were able to accomplish so much, they've extended the dike northward and tried to protect more homes. So, they're working on an enlarged project."

Once construction is complete, the mission will shift to the surveillance of the dikes and protection of the neighborhoods, including providing emergency response if problems are detected, the governor said.

"We're going to be keeping Black Hawk helicopters at both Pierre/Fort Pierre and at Dakota Dunes so we can do emergency evacuation of individuals who have otherwise refused to leave and now need to because of a dike or a levee issue," he said.

These helicopters can lift between 1-2 tons and can bring in rocks or sand if there is a breach that can be plugged, Daugaard said.

"They're the finger in the dike," he said.

Overall, the work has gone well.

"So far, we've only had one injury," Daugaard said. "A citizen was volunteering, God bless them, and they were struck by a day is done, they'll be surprised at the abilities they have, and it hasn't failed yet," he said.

"They're always pleasantly surprised at the end of the day, and that's always rewarding for me. That's what I do it for: to help the kids realize they have hidden potential and skills they aren't aware of."

Luken also has two sculptures visible in downtown Yankton. He created both the Veterans Memorial on Third and Broadway and the fountain on Fourth and Broadway.

"Not only does Scott do all these things for the community, but the guy is also an incredibly talented artist," Meylor said.

While Luken has always been around art via his family's business, Luken Memorials, he said he first became interested in the subject during elementary school.

"I was always drawing and doodling when I should have been doing something else," he said with a laugh.

As time went on, Luken took every art class he could, eventually earning a degree in commercial art from the Colorado Institute of Art.

Since then, he has won multiple design contests in the memorial industry and has been appointed a seat on a design correspondence board for the Monument Builders of North America.

Along with his work at Luken Memorials, Luken enjoys working in a variety of mediums.

"I get involved in about anything that involves art," he said.

"I'll do about anything, from illustrating to painting to sculpting. I enjoy doing a lot of different things."

Luken will be formally introduced as the 2011 Art Advocate of the Year at the Yankton Area Arts' first summer band concert Tuesday at 8 p.m. at the Riverside Park amphitheatre.

"If anyone is interested in coming and seeing him or congratulating him, it would be a good opportunity to do so," Meylor said.
