Levee

Stasch said the Missouri River's water level is above flood stage for the first time since the dam was completed in the late 1950s.

The corps is planning increased releases through Tuesday that would top the river out at a projected 1,434 feet above sea level, or 2 feet below the earthen levees.

Trucks heavy with loads of dirt and sandbags continued to rumble through Pierre and Fort Pierre on Sunday to provide material to shore up areas of the cities that might need additional protection.

Officials said nearly all of the approximately 3,000 people living in flood-prone areas had voluntarily evacuated by the weekend. South Dakota National Guard soldiers monitored levees in town and law enforcement officers patrolled neighborhoods where residents had left.

Eddie Ruiz, a cook at a Mexican restaurant in Pierre, was outside the business Sunday checking sandbags that had been placed around the restaurant to protect it. He said he and his wife and two young children already had to abandon their home by the river.

Ruiz said they left nearly a week ago and are now staying in an apartment on higher ground. The move cost him about $1,400.

"This water is terrible but my kids and wife are safe," he said. Their plan is to return home once the waters recede.

Sharon Williams, who lives a block from the swollen river in Pierre, walked her dog, Button, on Sunday near her apartment. She's lived in the city for 40 years and this is the highest she's seen the water.

But she said she's not worried.

She packed her bags, however, in case the water breached the levee near her home.

"I guess I'm just bull-headed," she said. "I'm not going to move out unless they make me."

Noem

Noem said the federal government has funding in place to help those affected by a natural disasters.

"We have specifically put in another $1 billion of disaster aid money in this funding bill," she said. "There is the potential for supplemental, if need be. We wanted to make sure that we did increase it in this bill. We are hoping that there will be enough there; if not, there is the opportunity to do more. If you think of it, across the country there has been all kinds of natural disasters, so federal resources are spread thin. But we are going to make sure that everyone is taken care of."

While Noem said she feels there are a lot of questions to be answered regarding how and why this situation happened, she said the focus first has to be helping everyone affected. She said the federal government will get to the bottom of how it all occurred once the immediate needs have been met.

When asked about the amount of water to be released from the Missouri River dams, she said people have to trust the Corps.

"They are the experts," she said. "The most I have heard in any meeting here in South Dakota or in D.C. is that 150,000 (cubic feet per second) is the max. I don't believe they would have us do all this work if they knew it was only going to get covered up and rolled over by water. But we have to be prepared and get to the levels we need to based on the information they gave us."

In other flood-related news from the weekend:

- The Red Cross evacuation

shelter is prepared and ready to receive those affected in the Yankton area. Those needing assistance, contact should Jack Steiner at 605-661-0161 for more details.

- The Yankton County Office of Emergency Management (YCOEM) is advising anyone working or recreating near Missouri River waters to use extreme caution. The increased releases from Gavins Point Dam, and subsequent planned releases, have made the river very turbulent and have made some shoreline areas very unstable.
- Homeowners and volunteers working near water should wear flotation devices and take other precautions to protect personal safety, the YCOEM advised in a press release.
- Additionally, local emergency officials are advising no boat traffic on the river below the dam. YCOEM Director Paul Scherschligt said the increased speed of the river and the amount of debris being swept down river has made it a very dangerous waterway.
- The State of South Dakota has restricted access to river boat ramps and closed the river to all boat traffic directly below the dam.

- The American Humane Society, with the assistance of the Heartland Humane Society, has set up an animal shelter at the Yankton County 4-H grounds.
- "Pet shelter care is being provided for those families evacuated due to flooding in the Yankton area," Yankton Police Animal Control Officer Lisa Brasel said in a press release. "PetSmart has graciously provided supplies and pet food."
- Owners can drop off and visit their pets between 8 a.m.-6 p.m.
- The society has planned for up to 200 animals at this time but will reassess the needs for housing larger numbers if needed. There will be veterinarian care available on site.
- Large animal housing will be considered on a case-by-case basis.
- For more information, call 605-661-9494.
- It was announced that Lewis and Clark Lake will remain at normal water levels and the lake will be one of the few bodies of water without boating restrictions this year. Boat ramps, camping pad, cabins and swimming beaches remain accessible for use.
