homer.

After Beltre's hit, Liriano struck out Nelson Cruz but gave up a single to Yorvit Torrealba that spoiled the shutout. Liriano drew a loud ovation from the sell-out crowd after finishing the inning.
"I got a little bit nervous in the eighth inning," he said. "I got behind in the count, and I had to throw a fastball."
Harrison wasn't bad himself, allowing five hits and two runs — one earned — while walking three and striking out three through six innings. But Liriano had a perfect game until one out in the seventh.
The fast-footed Andrus hit a slow bouncer that hugged the line and Hughes, playing third base in the majors for only the fifth time in his career, tried to make a backhanded play. The ball went under his glove and glanced off his knee into foul ground, and Andrus took second. Official scorer Gregg Wong ruled the play an error on Hughes.

"That's the last thing you want to do, drop-kick a ball nearly into the dugout, but he did a great job," Hughes said.
Hughes had three hits, including an RBI single in the first inning, and made one of three deft plays by the Twins defense earlier in the game to save potential hits.
"I don't think we did a good job of making adjustments offensively," Rangers first baseman Michael Young said. "But you never want to take away from another guy when he does his job well."
Liriano's rookie-year dominance in 2006 has yet to be re-established on a regular basis since the elbow injury — and subsequent ligament replacement surgery — that kept him out of the 2007 season.
"I haven't seen Frankie pitch like that in a long time. Even the no-hitter, he was still rattled," Cuddyer said, adding: "You could just feel it with the way he was finishing guys off. He throws it, and it's almost like he knows he's going to strike him out before the ball even hits the mitt. Boom, the hand goes up, and he walks off the mound. It's fun to see that."

Finishing a four-pitch strikeout of Josh Hamilton, Liriano ended the fourth inning in style by getting him to swing feebly and miss at sliders clocked at 85 and 87 mph.
"For a minute there, he just went through the lineup," Rangers manager Ron Washington said. "But then he hit a wall, so I sort of wish he would've hit that wall in the first."
The Twins have won nine of their last 11 to move within nine games of the Cleveland Indians in the AL Central. Their starters have a 1.96 ERA during that stretch.
"It's on our pitchers' shoulders," Gardenhire said, "and they're getting it done."
