Johnson

"I think it's too early to say what will happen," Johnson said. "But legislatively, Congress is too often known for not getting things done in an election year. We'll see what happens. We have had a rush of things completed this year — it doesn't look as bad as all of that — and we'll be making progress, as far as I'm concerned, throughout the year." Johnson hopes that the new Farm Bill being considered by Congress will be passed by the Senate without facing a filibuster. "The bill looks good from a northern agricultural perspective," he said. "But the southerners aren't satisfied, as of yet. The southerners have the rice and cotton and peanuts, and they're not happy about this farm bill. ... As you know, the farm bill can be held up by one person in the Senate, much less a filibuster, so we'll see what happens." "We need bipartisanship on the farm bill. It's always been that way," Johnson said. "It's less partisan and more regional, as far as attitudes toward the farm bill. Republicans and Democrats in the north are all together, and unfortunately, Republicans and Democrats in the south don't see it that way." Johnson said he hopes the farm bill is approved sometime this fall. Otherwise action would have to be taken during the lame duck session of Congress following the November election. If Congress still failed to pass the legislation in 2012, the current bill's provisions would need to be extended into 2013, he said. Economic uncertainty in several European countries, Johnson said, is currently casting a pall on fiscal recovery efforts in the United States. "Anything can happen that is beyond the president's control," he said. "But the lesson that Europe is learning is that they cannot solve their (economic) problems through austerity alone. They must combine austerity with growth to be satisfied with the outcome, and the president is doing that quite well — not good enough, but he's doing his best." "We'll see what the combination of growth and austerity does as opposed to the Europeans, the Germans especially, who want austerity alone," Johnson said.
