Kids

Such information collection is central to Facebook. Every photo or status update a kid posts on Facebook could count as information collection. Many companies consider the parental-consent requirement too burdensome, so they simply ban all children under 13 instead. But that ban is difficult to enforce. In many cases, parents themselves help children skirt it by setting up profiles for them and lying about their ages. There are an estimated 7.5 million kids under 13 on Facebook, out of more than 900 million users worldwide.

In a statement, Facebook noted that many recent reports have highlighted "just how difficult it is to enforce age restrictions on the Internet, especially when parents want their children to access online content and services."

"We are in continuous dialogue with stakeholders, regulators and other policymakers about how best to help parents keep their kids safe in an evolving online environment," the company said.

Few details are available on the nature of Facebook's tests, which The Wall Street Journal reported on in Monday's editions. Relaxing the ban on younger children could be a long way off, or never get implemented, as happens with many features that Facebook tests.

The report comes just two weeks after Facebook began trading stock as a public company. Its stock price has fallen in part because of concerns about its ability to keep increasing revenue and make money from its growing mobile audience.

To James Steyer, the CEO of the nonprofit Common Sense Media, Facebook's discussions on permitting young kids to join is about expanding its audience — and profits.

"With the growing concerns and pressure around Facebook's business model, the company appears to be doing whatever it takes to identify new revenue streams and short-term corporate profits to impress spooked shareholders," Steyer said in a statement.

Role

"My staff (in the finance department) has to pick up the slack on some of the stuff I do," he stated.

"(Becoming the city manager is) a little uncomfortable in that you are suddenly thrust into overseeing people who are more like peers," he added. "I'm overseeing the money most of the time. Now, I'm overseeing people, too. It has not been a problem in the past, and I think the biggest reason for that is we have pretty good employees."

It's the team aspect that is the best part of being the city manager, according to Viereck.

"It can be a challenging job, but it can also be very rewarding because we have a pretty good staff," he said.

early endorsements from Johnson and former Sens. Daschle and George McGovern.

But Barth, a Minnehaha County commissioner, garnered some unexpected national attention last month with a campaign video that went viral online and aired on CNN. In it, he walks around farmland covered in goofy props talking about his time overseas, his military service and even his experience riding an ostrich. At one point, he picks up a gun and fires — and a rubber chicken falls from the sky, apparently killed.

Varišek also tried his hand at humor in an earlier YouTube video, saying that he initially wasn't sure if his mother would be the only one to support his candidacy.

As of May 16, Varišek had raised more than $300,000 in campaign contributions, while Barth had raised just $45,000, with about half of that coming from a loan he made to his own campaign. (By the same date, Noem had raised $1.8 million.)

Varišek said he's proud of the endorsements by three of South Dakota's most noted Democratic senators. Barth said he wouldn't mind having those endorsements, but he believes the endorsements and campaign contributions also show Varišek is closely tied to a malfunctioning Washington.

The two candidates have agreed on many issues — such as the importance of crop insurance for farmers — but have differed on a pointed few, including whether taxes should be allowed to rise when tax cuts passed about a decade ago under then-President George Bush are due to expire later this year.

Varišek said he wants to end tax cuts for people earning higher incomes, but leave them in place for people with more modest incomes. He also wants to close some tax loopholes and end tax subsidies for oil companies.

"We need to take a balanced approach to balancing our budget, which means some spending cuts but also changes to the tax code that will increase revenues," Varišek said.

Barth said he would pursue spending cuts throughout the federal budget, but he opposes any tax cuts.

"I don't plan to raise taxes at all until our economy becomes more robust," Barth said.

Barth has said he would support gay marriage, but Varišek opposes it. Varišek said he supports civil unions to give same-sex couples equal treatment under the law.

The two Democratic candidates agree that President Barack Obama's health care overhaul should be revamped but not repealed. They said valuable provisions of the law include allowing young people to stay on their parents' insurance until age 26 and preventing insurance companies from discriminating against people with pre-existing health conditions.

Barth and Varišek also agree that agriculture policy should continue to rely on crop insurance as part of the safety net for farmers.

Varišek said the farm policy must support conservation programs, wind energy, biofuels and provisions that protect farmers from market manipulations by packers.

Barth said spending can be cut in the farm bill while still protecting farmers. He wonders why tobacco farmers are subsidized while the government is also discouraging smoking.

Barth, castigating Noem and Congress in general, said members of the House and Senate have failed to live up to their promises to cut spending and balance the budget. "They're not doing their jobs. They're lying," he said.

As the only candidate to spend time in the military — a half dozen years in the Army Reserve — Barth believes defense spending can be cut.

"Nobody is going to invade the United States," Barth said. "Personally, I have enough weapons to hold out for a while, and I bet the average South Dakotan has at least 20 rifles and pistols in their home."

Varišek said he offers Democrats the best chance to beat Noem in November.

"Since the beginning of this campaign, I've been working hard to build an organization capable of doing that," Varišek said.
