demand that the ruling generals reverse their decision.

In his first televised speech, the 60-year old U.S.-trained engineer called on Egyptians to unite and tried to reassure minority Christians, who mostly backed Morsi's rival Ahmed Shafiq because they feared Islamic rule.

He said he carries "a message of peace" to the world and pledged to preserve Egypt's international accords, a reference to the peace deal with Israel.

He also paid tribute to nearly 900 protesters killed in last year's uprising.

"I wouldn't have been here between your hands as the first elected president without ... the blood, the tears, and sacrifices of the martyrs," he said.

In the lengthy and redundant speech, Morsi appeared to be struggling to compose his sentences. Wearing a blue suit and tie, he looked stiff and uncomfortable and did not smile throughout as he read from a paper. He was non-confrontational and did not mention the last-minute power grab by the ruling military, instead praising the armed forces.
The White House congratulated Morsi and urged him to advance national unity as he forms a new government. White House press secretary Jay Carney said Morsi's victory is a milestone in Egypt's transition to democracy after decades of authoritarian rule under Mubarak. The Obama administration had expressed no public preference in the presidential race.

Left on the sidelines of the political drama are the liberal and secular youth groups that drove the uprising against Mubarak, left to wonder whether Egypt has taken a step towards becoming an Islamist state. Some grudgingly supported Morsi in the face of Shafiq, who was Mubarak's last prime minister, while others boycotted the vote.

Morsi will now have to reassure them that he represents the whole country, not just Islamists, and will face enormous challenges after security and the economy badly deteriorated in the transition period.

Pro-democracy leader Mohammed ElBaradei urged unity after the results were announced.

"It is time we work all as Egyptians as part of a national consensus to build Egypt that is based on freedom and social justice," he wrote on his Twitter account.

Egyptians celebrated in Cairo, Egypt's Tahrir Square Sunday, after the Muslim Brotherhood's Mohammed Morsi was announced the winner of the nation's presidential election.

deeply polarized with one side backing Shafiq, who promised to provide stability and prevent Egypt from becoming a theocracy. Because of his military career, many saw him as the military's preferred candidate.

In the other camp are those eager for democratic change and backers of Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood who were persecuted, jailed and banned under Mubarak but now find themselves one of the two most powerful groups in

The other power center is the ruling military council that took power after the uprising and is headed by Mubarak's defense minister of 20 years.

Just one week ago, at the moment polls were closing in the presidential runoff, the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (SCAF) issued constitutional amendments that stripped the president's office of most of its major powers. The ruling generals made themselves the final arbiters over the most pressing issues still complicating the transition— such as writing the constitution, legislating, passing the state budget— and granted military police broad powers to detain civilians.

"I am happy the Brotherhood won because now the revolution will continue on the street against both of them, the Brotherhood and the SCAF," said Lobna Darwish, an activist who has boycotted the elections.

Also, a few days before that constitutional declaration, a court dissolved the freely elected parliament, which is dominated by the Muslim Brotherhood, leaving the military now in charge of experts said the results were used a bargaining chip between the generals and the Brotherhood over the parameters of what appears to be a new powersharing agreement. The country's new constitution is not written and the authorities of the president are not clear.

Brotherhood members and

This is the first time modern Egypt will be headed by an Islamist and by a freely elected civilian. The country's last four presidents over the past six decades have all came from the ranks of the military.

"Congratulations because this means the end of the Mubarak state," said Shady el-Ghazali Harb, a prominent activist who was among the leaders of the protests in January and February last year.

The results of the elections were delayed for four days amid accusations of manipulation and foul play by both sides, raising political tensions in Egypt to a fever pitch.

The delay plunged the country into nerve-wrecking anticipation and pushed tensions to a fever pitch. Parallel mass rallies by Shafiq and Morsi supporters were held in different parts of Cairo and cut-throat media attacks by supporters of both swarmed TV shows. In the hours before the announcement of the winner, the fear of new violence was palpable.

Heavy security was deployed around the country, especially outside state institutions, in anticipation of possible violence. Workers were sent home early from jobs, jewelry stores closed for fear of looting and many were stocking up on food and forming long lines at cash machines in case new troubles began.

Morsi narrowly defeated Shafiq with 51.7 percent of the vote versus 48.3, by a margin of only 800,000 votes, the election commission said. Turnout was 51

Farouk Sultan, the head of the commission, described the elections as "an important phase in the end of building our nascent democratic experience."

Sultan went to pains to explain the more than 400 complaints presented by the two candidates challenging counting procedures and alleging attempts of rigging. It appeared to be an attempt to discredit claims that the election commission was biased in favor of Shafiq, the candidate perceived as backed by the military rulers.

The country is deeply divided between supporters of the Brotherhood, liberals and leftists who also decided to back them as a way to stand up to the military, and other secular forces that fear the domination of the Brotherhood, and grew critical of it in the past year. The small margin of victory for Morsi also sets him for a strong opposition from supporters of Shafiq, viewed as a representative of the old regime.

Naguib Sawiris, a Coptic Christian business tycoon who joined a liberal bloc in voicing opposition to the Muslim Brotherhood a day before the results were announced, said he expects the new president to send a reassuring message to Egypt's Christian minority who represent around 10 percent of the population of 85 million.

There are fears of imposing an Islamic state ... where Christians don't have same rights," Sawiris told the private TV station CBC. Morsi "is required to prove the opposite. ... We don't want speeches or promises but in the coming period, it is about taking action. ... He was not our choice but we are accepting it is a democratic choice.3

Hamdeen Sabahi, a leftist presidential candidate who came in a surprising third place in the first round of elections, asked Morsi to live up to his pledges to form a national coalition government and appoint presidential aides from different groups "that express the largest national consensus.

Khaled Abdel-Hamid, a leading leftist politician, said Morsi must fight to get his powers back or he will lose any popular support he may have garnered.

"If he fights to get his power back, we will support him. But if he doesn't fight back, then he is settling for siding with the military," he said.

The tournament was one of the many ways Burgess tried to help the YHS golf teams, head coach Brett Sime said.

"She meant a lot to our program," Sime said. "She ran a tournament where all the proceeds would benefit the Yankton teams. She put a lot of work into that, with sponsorships and people to donate door prizes. "She made it a good tourna-

The money raised from the DSCB Scramble went directly to equipment and other things the YHS golfers needed, Sime said. As such, there was obviously a direct connection between Burgess and the programs.

"It meant a lot to the kids, and I know she will definitely be missed," Sime said. "She always said that if something ever happened to her, she hoped her family would keep that tournament would like to honor him with a card shower. Birthday greetings for Arland may be sent to 2126 Douglas Ave Apt 4, Yankton, SD 57078.

Even though Burgess's grandchildren have been out of the high school golf ranks for a few years now, Sime said she made sure to stay in touch. "I knew she at least kept track of the programs and how we were doing, and she and I talked on the phone a few times," Sime said. "She was always active; no matter where she was.' One of Burgess's closest friends, Alta Kussman, experienced many local games alongside one of Yankton's biggest sports fans. "We used to go to the Yankton girls' basketball games together all the time, and even some football games," Kussman said. "When her youngest granddaughter (Andrea Walsh) played basketball, we went to all the games. She was always there giving sup-

Not only did the duo share bleacher seats together, they shared hospital stays, Kussman

"We even went on a trip together years ago to Phoenix," Kussman said. "There were lots of things we did together. We always had a marvelous time." Both members of the GFWC

Yankton Woman's club, Kussman served as assistant treasurer alongside Burgess, who previously served as state GFWC treasurer and Southeast District president.

"I'm going to miss her greatly," Kussman said. "It's hard to imagine that she's gone. She was so vital to this community.' Proof of her impact on so many people in Yankton was felt over the weekend, when Walsh's younger brother, Robert, called her and relayed a scene. "My brother called me (Saturday night) and said people have been standing around, reminiscing about grandma and sharing stories," Walsh said. "We were all really close." Burgess is survived by her son, Keith, of Berthoud, Colo., and daughters Julie Walsh of Yankton and Sally Russell of Logan, Utah. The funeral will be held at 3 p.m. today (Monday) at St. Benedict Catholic Church in Yankton, with burial to follow in the Sacred Heart Cemetery.
