Lautenberg

Americans with his commitment to our nation's health and safety," President Barack Obama said in a statement, "from improving our public transportation to protecting citizens from gun violence to ensuring that members of our military and their families get the care they deserve."

The Senate observed a moment of silence in Lautenberg's memory, and at the White House the flag was lowered to half-staff.

Lautenberg served nearly three decades in the Senate in two stints, beginning with an upset victory in 1982 over Republican Rep. Millicent Fenwick, the pipe-smoking, pearl-wearing patrician who was the model for the cartoon character Lacey Davenport in "Doonesbury."

Possessed with neither a dynamic speaking style nor a telegenic face, he won his last race in 2008 at age 84, becoming the first New Jersey politician ever elected to five Senate terms.

"People don't give a darn about my age," Lautenberg said then. "They know I'm vigorous. They know I've got plenty of energy."

Over the years, he was a reliable Democratic vote on such issues as unions, guns and the environment. A native of one of the most congested and heavily industrialized and polluted states, he worked to secure hundreds of millions of dollars for mass transit projects, ardently defended Amtrak and pushed for money for the Superfund toxic-waste cleanup program.

He was the author of a 1984 law that threatened to withhold federal highway money from states that did not adopt a drinking age of 21, a measure that passed amid rising alarm over drunken driving. At the time, some states allowed people as young as 18 to drink.

By 1988, every state was in compliance with the law, which has been widely credited with reducing highway deaths.

A former smoker, Lautenberg was one of two prime sponsors of the 1989 law that banned smoking on all domestic flights of less than six hours, one of several anti-smoking laws he championed. The measure helped pave the way for today's numerous restrictions on where people can light up.

Despite poor health that left him in a wheelchair, he returned to the Senate in April for several votes on gun legislation. He voted in favor of enhanced background checks for gun purchases and reinstatement of a ban on assault-style weapons. Both measures failed.

Lautenberg had announced earlier this year that he would not seek another term in 2014, and Newark Mayor Cory Booker, a fellow Democrat, said he would run for the seat.

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell called Lautenberg "a patriot whose success in business and politics made him a great American success story and a stand-out even within the fabled Greatest Generation."

Republican Gov. Chris Christie, who frequently tangled with Lautenberg, said: "I think the best way to describe Frank Lautenberg — and the way he would probably want to be described to all of you today — is as a fighter. Sen. Lautenberg fought for the things he believed in, and sometimes he just fought because he liked to."

"I give him praise on a life well-lived," the governor added.

Christie will appoint an interim successor. A special election could be held in the fall, or the appointed successor could serve until the 2014 election. Because New Jersey law is vague on the matter, the courts might have to sort it out.

offers a much better opportunity to export to Chinese consumers," the governor said. "The buyer is a Hong Kong-based company, which I think is good because Hong Kong, unlike the rest of China, has freedom of speech, a more democratic-type of government, and they have some protections that we enjoy in America and want our businesses protected by."

"Hong Kong is still a gateway to China, and our meat exports will have a great opportunity here with this very good gateway into China," Daugaard said.

He added that during his two trade missions to China, officials raised the topic of food safety.

"Chinese consumers want safe food ... they want a food product from America, because they trust the American brands," Daugaard said. "Having a consumer product that's created by a company that's as vertically integrated as Smithfield — they own their hogs, they raise their hogs, they slaughter and package and sell to a finished product — there is a confidence in that product because you see it from inception to the table."

"I really think this is a good news situation (with this purchase)," the governor said. "Time will tell — maybe I'm wrong, but I'm hopeful."
