After answering questions a few summers ago about what was wrong with their scouts, Twins officials have quickly found themselves the subject of all kinds of praise around the sport this summer as the numbers pile up for players like Buxton and Sano. 'We don't get too carried away

It's part of a seismic shift in attitude that goes hand-in-hand with last year's implementation of blood testing for human growth hormone and the commissioner's call in spring training for increasing the 50-game penalty for first offenders. The fact that some 20 current players are under investigation shows we still can't trust what we see on the field. Players have been using PEDs for at least a quarter century and they'll continue to try to outwit the testers because the

Just maybe, though, this is a step toward regaining that trust again one day. This could be the turning point of a battle baseball ioined far too late.

And if that ends up being part of Selig's legacy, too, then more power to him.

MIAMI (AP) — When the Miami Heat pulled off what so many thought was unthinkable and signed LeBron James and Chris Bosh to play alongside Dwyane Wade three summers ago, San Antonio coach Gregg Popovich was impressed. So he called Heat President

Pat Riley to say exactly that.
