back and are sold two or three times."

Rains said he felt moved to take on the Wounded Warriors mission.

"This was a spontaneous decision. I have collected Corvettes, but for this, I went with a Ford," he said.

"This is the first vintage car that I have sold. We are looking at probably auctioning it in January."

Fitzmaurice's signature represented the first step in trying to reach as many of the 79 living Medal of Honor recipients as possible, Rains said.

"We are hoping to get 50 to 60 signatures when they gather for their (Gettysburg) meeting," he said.

Thursday's audience also heard from Col. John D. Folsom, a retired Marine who founded the Wounded Warriors Family Support organization. Folsom praised Rains' decision to purchase the vintage car, restore it and sell it to benefit wounded warriors.

"Ronnie Rains is one of the most extraordinary, generous men I have had the privilege of meeting," Folsom told the Press & Dakotan. "This is Ronnie's baby. It's his mission and vision. I support the job that Ronnie Rains is doing."

Folsom admired the progress made on the car and its body.

"This was basically a rust bucket," to Syria makes it difficult to provide much large-scale training. Other smaller-scale training can be done outside Syria's borders.

A U.S. official said the CIA and special operations trainers have already been training Syrian rebels on the use of anti-aircraft weaponry provided by the Persian Gulf states, as well as encrypted communications equipment, and was expected to run the expanded training program as well.

All of the officials insisted on anonymity in order to discuss internal administration discussions.

Word of the stepped up assistance followed new U.S. intelligence assessments showing that Assad has used chemical weapons, including sarin, on a small scale multiple times in the last year.

U.S. intelligence estimates 100 to 150 people have been killed in those attacks, the White House said, constituting a small percentage of the 93,000 people killed in Syria over the last two years.

The White House said it believes Assad's regime still maintains control of Syria's chemical weapons stockpiles and does not see any evidence that rebel forces have launched attacks using the deadly agents.

The Obama administration announced in April that it had "varying degrees of confidence" that sarin had been used in Syria. But they said at the time that they had not been able to determine who was responsible for participation. At the conclusion of the auction, USPS will evaluate the high bid to determine whether that value is acceptable."

Those hoping to purchase the post office for a bargain basement price may be disappointed.

According to the GSA website, the agency is required to obtain the appraised fair market value for property sold to the general public. That figure is not disclosed.

"GSA has a high success rate at conveying property via its online auctions, and will use that expertise to maximize bidder participation," Nowacki stated. "It successfully auctioned five properties for USPS in 2012 as part of a pilot program, and is currently in the process of initiating auctions for 19 USPS properties nationwide. Last year, GSA conveyed more than 100 excess federal properties."

Nowacki said the other USPS properties are mostly east of the Mississippi, and Yankton is the only real estate being auctioned off in South Dakota and its bordering states.

The downtown post office at 335 Walnut Street was built in 1905. The USPS closed the building in January 2012 and put it up for sale. Postal operations were consolidated into the annex at 506 West 25th Street. That facility was built in 2000.

The more conclusive findings announced Thursday were aided by evidence sent to the United States by France, which, along with Britain, has announced it had determined that Assad's government had used chemical weapons.

Not all Medal of Honor recipients returned home alive.

Thursday's program honored Sue Wilson of San Angelo, Texas. She attended school with Rains in Odessa, and her brother, Alfred "Mac" Wilson, was killed in Vietnam in 1969 at age 21.

Sue Wilson held a picture of her late brother and his framed Medal of Honor. She described to the Press & Dakotan her brother's ultimate sacrifice.

"There was enemy fire and they were ambushed. He threw his body on a hand grenade," she said. "My brother's death) just killed my mother. She died three months to the day after my brother was killed. She grieved herself to death and died of a broken heart."

Sue Wilson said she felt grateful for the support given wounded service members and seeing Harris and the 1956 Thunderbird.

"Ronnie Rains and John Folsom don't want our military to be forgotten," she said. "I feel so honored to be among this and to be part of this."

clamoring for bolder Western intervention, particularly given the estimated 5,000 Hezbollah guerrillas propping up Assad's forces. Assad's stunning military success last week at Qusair, near the Lebanese border, and preparations for offensives against Homs and Aleppo have made the matter more urgent.

While McCain has pressed for a greater role for the U.S. military, other lawmakers have expressed reservations about American involvement in another conflict and fears that weapons sent to the rebels could fall into the hands of al-Qaida-linked groups.

Sen. Chris Murphy, D-Conn., a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, condemned the Assad regime but expressed serious concerns about the United States being pulled into a proxy war.

"There are many actions that the United States can take to increase our humanitarian assistance to refugee populations and opposition groups short of injecting more weapons into the conflict," Murphy said. "I urge the president to exercise restraint and to consult closely with Congress before undertaking any course of action to commit American military resources to Syrian opposition forces."

House Speaker John Boehner, R-Ohio, also urged the White House to consult with Congress.

"It is long past time to bring the Assad regime's bloodshed in Syria to an end," he said through a spokesman, Brendan Buck. "As President Obama examines his options, it is our hope he will properly consult with Congress before taking any action."

cross a "red line" and constitute a "game changer" for U.S. policy on Syria, which until now has focused entirely on providing the opposition with nonlethal assistance and humanitarian aid.

The White House said it had notified Congress, the United Nations and key international allies about the new U.S. chemical weapons determination. Obama will discuss the assessments, along with broader problems in Syria, next week during the G-8 summit in Northern Ireland.

Among those in attendance will be Russian President Vladimir Putin, one of Assad's most powerful backers. Obama and Putin will hold a one-on-one meeting on the sidelines of the summit, where the U.S. leader is expected to press his Russian counterpart to drop his political and military support for the Syrian government.

"We believe that Russia and all members of the international community should be concerned about the use of chemical weapons," Rhodes said.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Mark Lyall Grant said his country was "not surprised by the determination made by the U.S. government" given its own assessments, and was in consultation with the Americans about next steps.

The U.S. has so far provided the Syrian rebel army with rations and medical supplies. In April, Kerry announced that the administration had agreed in principle to expand its military support to the opposition to include defensive items like night vision goggles, body armor and armored vehicles.

Reserve Program (CRP), to which the landowners no longer belong.

"Lots of the shelterbelts being taken out are for the old original farm homesteads, and there isn't any cost share now," Schwartz said. "Some of them being taken out were likely in CRP, but once the CRP expires, they can do whatever they want with that land. We can't track that."

In addition to clearing more land for farming, Henderson said that there are also many other reasons for clearing out the trees.

"They can harbor varmints or can be an eyesore in some cases," he said. "One of the biggest reasons is there aren't as many families here anymore. Many of those trees were planted by homesteaders for protection, and they just aren't needed anymore."

Despite many shelterbelt trees being removed, Schwartz said there are still plenty of reasons to plant new ones, and financially incentives are available through the FSA.

"We do have some programs in CRP for windbreaks or what we call
