Flag Day

becomes a symbol."

She said that is how she feels about the American flag.

"Our flag is much more than pieces of cloth sewn together, and Flag Day isn't simply about honoring a particular design on a cloth," Bodenstedt said. "It is more about taking time to reflect on our freedoms and the principles of our great nation for which that flag stands. This flag is a reminder of who we are."

Another story she shared was an anecdote often told by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) about Mike Christian, a Navy navigator who was a prisoner of war with McCain in Vietnam.

Christian used scraps of cloth and a bamboo needle to sew an American flag into his shirt. When the flag was discovered, he was beaten badly for it. However, later that day McCain said he observed Christian sewing another flag into his shirt.

"He was not making the flag because it made Mike Christian feel better," McCain once related. "He was making the flag because he knew how important it was to us to be able to pledge our allegiance to our flag and country."

Bodenstedt said she understands that love of country and the strong meaning the flag embodies.

"I know the feeling of pride when the flag is carried in a parade," she stated. "I know the feeling of deep reverence when I see the tiny American flags adorning military graves in the cemetery. I know the feeling of happiness when I see those glorious Stars and Stripes after emerging from behind the Berlin Wall or coming back from a long tour overseas."

"I can't explain why I get a lump in my throat when I hear the National Anthem and see the Stars and Stripes raised at the Olympic awards ceremonies," Bodenstedt added. "I just do."

The ceremony Friday also included a short presentation on the evolution of the American flag through the years and a recognition of the military veterans present.

What's First: Park Or Parking Brake?

BY TOM AND RAY MAGLIOZZI
 King Features Syndicate, Inc.

Dear Tom and Ray:

My husband and I are at odds on this issue. We have a 2003 Mini Cooper with an automatic transmission. He applies the hand brake before throwing the car into Park. The car then makes a noticeable creak when we get out of the car. I usually put the car in Park, then apply the hand brake. If I'm on an incline, the car will roll a little, then stop — but no nasty creak. Hubbie's logic is that it's better to be hard on the hand brake than to be hard on the transmission. The creak just makes me uneasy! Any advice on who's right? — Cat

RAY: Well, we're glad this is all you're at odds over. During my brother's most recent marriage, they were at odds because he would put the car in Park, and she would HIT HIM with the hand brake.

TOM: The good news is that neither of you is doing any damage with your respective parking methods. But we prefer Hubbie's.

RAY: When you put the car in Park on a hill, Cat, and it rolls a foot or so, that's because the parking pawl — the device that locks up the output shaft of the transmission and prohibits the car from rolling — is not a precise instrument. It's a ratchet with some slop in it, and it can allow the car to roll a bit in either direction before it jams into place and holds the car.

TOM: There's nothing dangerous about that — unless you just parked six inches up the hill from Leadpipe Louie's new Cadillac.

RAY: We've never seen a parking pawl break from rolling, so that's not a concern. But if the car rolls and jams the parking pawl, it can make it hard for you to get OUT of Park when you try to drive away.

TOM: Applying the parking brake BEFORE you put it in Park eliminates that problem. The brake holds the car in place and doesn't let the car roll until the parking pawl jams up. You just have to remember — when you come back — to take the transmission out of Park first before releasing the parking brake.

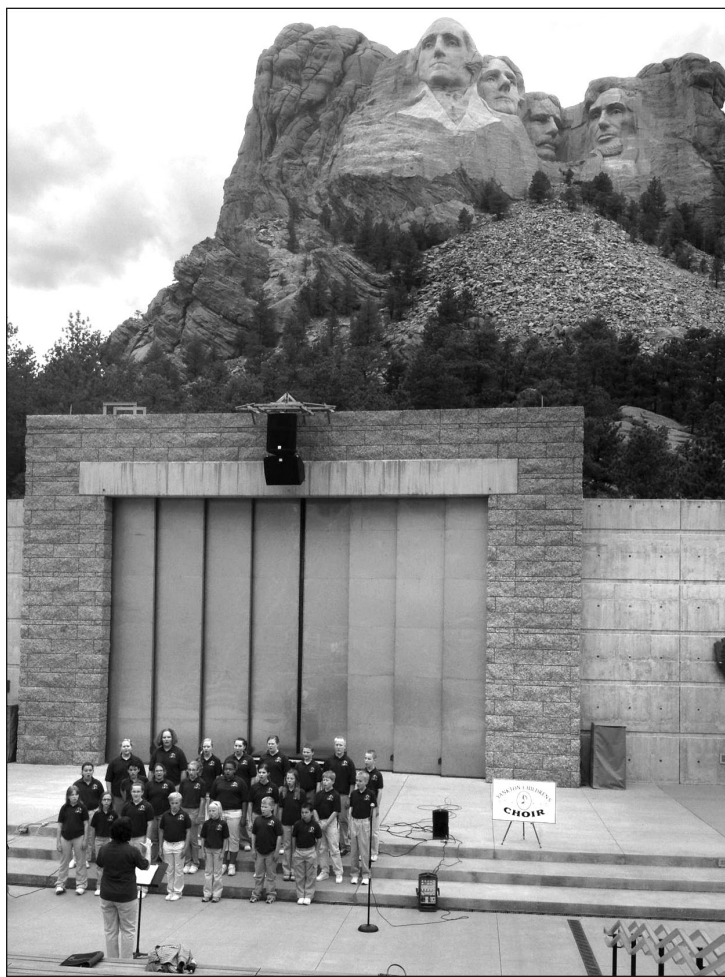

RAY: The creak you're hearing is just the parking brake grabbing. That's nothing to worry about.

TOM: No. My brother creaks when he grabs now, too.

Yankton Children's Choir Takes Trip To Black Hills

Yankton Children's Choir has been planning all year to take a three-day trip across the state. Twenty-five children along with chaperones as well as Deb Kruse, Choral Director, and Dixie Church, Accompanist, (pictured) traveled by [Mount Marty College] bus, making several stops along the way to sing at various venues including Wall Drug, Mount Rushmore National Monument and Storybook Island.

While in the Black Hills, the group stayed at the beautiful Placerville Camp.

Dot Stoll, executive director, states, "It was a great bonding experience and the kids received countless positive remarks from those who heard them sing as well as from restaurant managers saying they were the most respectful group of kids they have had in their establishment."

The choir generally goes on a trip every other year, giving the children a fun event to end the season. This trip, undoubtedly like every other, was filled with Band-Aids, singing and lots of laughter.

If you have any questions regarding the choir, contact Stoll by email dotster700@hotmail.com or call or text 605-660-1819.

USD Law School Graduates Top U.S. News' Judicial Clerkships Rankings

VERMILLION — Which law schools' graduates are setting the bar when it comes to judicial clerkships? According to rankings compiled by U.S. News & World Report, the University of South Dakota School of Law is one of the best in the country for 2011 graduates who are working at judicial clerkships with federal, state and local judges.

State and Local Judicial Clerkship Rankings released by U.S. News show that the USD School of Law is fifth nationally as 27 percent of 2011 graduates are employed with state and local judicial clerkships. Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey-Camden, tops the law school list with 39 percent of its 2011 J.D. grads employed as state and local judicial clerks.

"Judicial clerkships are highly coveted by law school graduates and often serve as a conduit between law school and the practice of law," said Tom Geu, dean of the USD School of Law.

"Judges at any level, whether it's federal, state or locally, will tell you that law clerks play an integral part in the legal process."

The information released by U.S. News points out that a judicial clerkship at the state or local level is often a catalyst for a highly successful legal career as it provides law school graduates with an opportunity to hone research and writing skills as well as exposure to wide-ranging legal issues.

"A clerkship offers a unique experience for graduates to learn the judicial process from a different perspective. It is also an opportunity to see lawyers work and help the graduate decide where to further their legal career," added Geu.
