Gunman Shoots Man During Catholic Mass In Utah

OGDEN, Utah (AP) — Police say a gunman walked into a Catholic church and shot a man in the back of the head during Mass on Sunday in Ogden.

Witnesses say they heard one gunshot during the 11:30 a.m. Mass at St. James Catholic Church, and that parishioners immediately hit the floor.

The victim was taken to McKay-Dee Hospital in Ogden, where he was listed in critical but stable condition. His name wasn't immediately released.

Police say the victim was deliberately targeted by the gunman and it wasn't a random act of violence.

The suspect was identified as 35-year-old Charles Jennings Jr. He was last seen fleeing in a stolen 1996 white GM pickup truck.

While police haven't disclosed the relationship between the two, some parishioners say the victim was the gunman's father-in-law.

lon, "there's no way to do this in a standoff — 'We're just here to help, not going to get our hands dirty.'"

Fallon, the former head of U.S. Central Command who helped draw up and carry out the 1992 no-fly-zone in Iraq, said the challenge "is that you'd better be prepared for escalation and expansion of mission."

"The likely expansion will be providing air support for guys on the ground," said Fallon, now on the board of directors at the American Security Project, a think-tank started by Secretary of State John Kerry when Kerry was a senator.

Last Thursday, the White House deputy national security adviser Ben Rhodes announced the Obama administration has agreed, after months of hesitation, to start supplying the rebels with upgraded military aid. That decision came as a result of stronger intelligence indicating that Assad has used chemical weapons against his people multiple times this year.

Rhodes would not detail the type of aid. But military officials and experts said it probably would include small-arms weapons, shoulder-fired anti-tank grenades and ammunition.

That would mark the White House's first lethal shipment to Syria. Until now, the administration has mostly supplied the rebels with military equipment, such as body armor and communications devices, and humanitarian aid to the Syrian people.

Obama has not ruled out imposing a no-fly zone in Syria, Rhodes said.

But, Rhodes said, "people need to understand that not only are there huge costs associated with the no-fly zone, not only would it be difficult to implement, but the notion that you can solve the very deeply rooted challenges on the ground in Syria from the air are not immediately apparent."

Supporters of a no-fly zone in Syria point to the one that was established by NATO over Libya in 2011. It overwhelmed Moammar Gadhafi's air defenses and attacked tanks and military vehicles that threatened civilians.

But European nations have shown little appetite for getting directly involved in Syria, where Assad's forces possess an air defense system made far more robust with Russian-bought weapons than what Gadhafi had.

Last month, Russia acknowledged it has agreed to sell Syria advanced S-300 air-defense missiles, which are considered to be the cutting edge in aircraft interception technology and could make a no-fly zone very costly.

Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, have been pushing for a no-fly zone in Syria, and last week said supplying arms and ammunition to rebels is not enough to curb Assad's air power. They raised the option of using cruise missiles, which can be launched from outside of Syria, as one way of securing Syria's air space.

On Sunday, Sen. Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee, agreed. "A no-fly zone may be the, ultimately, tactic that has to be taken," he told NBC's "Meet the Press."

Responded Sen. Mark Udall, D-Colo.: "You know, though, a no-fly zone and other involvement may lead to this slippery slope that others talked about."

Twenty years ago, the U.S. mission in Iraq showed that no-fly zones must be aggressively enforced if they are to work.

Military air units generally need to be working closely with ground forces to make sure that airstrikes and missile attacks hit their intended targets and don't kill civilians.

Fallon said that's how no-fly zones often prompt a mission creep, as deploying air forces can easily turn into a need to send in ground troops. U.S. and European officials vehemently maintain there are no plans to launch a ground war in Syria.

Though fighter jets flew over the vast Iraqi desert every day for more than a decade, they had no help or guidance on the ground, and were unable to stop Saddam from moving his army in to attack Shiites and drain the desert region's vital marshlands, which served as a water lifeline to the local population. Saddam still flew Iraqi helicopters and gunships into the south to crush a rag-tag rebellion.

Iraqi officials estimate at least 200,000 Shiites were killed, and thousands more fled to neighboring Iran, a Shiite state, for refuge.

"The no-fly zone had a limited effect on Saddam's ability to hurt the Shiites," Haider Mansour, a teacher from the Shiite-dominated city of Basra in Iraq's south, said Saturday. "But it increased the suffering of ordinary people because it forced Saddam to dry the marshes."

Nasr said Iraq's majority Shiites never forgot the tepid U.S. support against Saddam during the 1990s. Despite the U.S.-led invasion that overthrew Saddam, Nasr said it's little surprise that Baghdad's Shiite-led government now arguably has stronger ties with Iran than it does with Washington.

The parallels between Iraq and Syria are clear, Nasr said, as are the potential consequences.

"There was an uprising against a dictator who was no friend of ours, and we did not prevent a massacre," Nasr said. He said the U.S. inaction opened the door for Shiite militias and radicalism, and led to Iran's influence in Baghdad "because nobody else supported Shiites against Saddam."

"And so, one can say, 'We can tolerate hundreds of thousands of people being killed.'" Nasr said. "But there are consequences to it."

Fallon said the major flaw in the Iraqi no-fly zone was the lack of a clear plan or, even, an ultimate goal.

"At the time, it sounded OK," he said. "It was certainly much less dramatic, it wasn't necessarily going to be a shooting war, it was going to be to 'keep Saddam under control.'"

"But what was the end state? Nobody knew. But we did it anyway. And so this thing went on forever," Fallon said. "And the longer it went on the more unpalatable it was to stop it. And was it effective? No. Did it stop Saddam? No."

The current Iraqi government has ignored several U.S. requests for help in stopping Iranian flights of supplies to Syria.

Creating an effective no-fly zone in Syria would require fighter jets or drones equipped with radar and weapons as well as other surveillance planes, said national security analyst Anthony Cordesman at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He predicted it probably would have to be done without U.N. support, and it may lead to U.S. troop deaths.

Associated Press writer Sameer N. Yacoub in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Project

They do projects all over the state, and I first contacted (the SDNG) two year ago."

The flood-related damage ranged from erosion to lost trees, Cull said. "And we had debris from all over hell," he added.

As host of the 2014 national and world championships, Cull faced a major deadline in completing the $1.12 million in work.

"We have 1,000 people spending two weeks here, and that's huge, not only for us," he said. "You look at it in terms of economic development."

The SDNG soldiers will exercise their skills with the construction of three new NFAA field ranges as well as an NFAA outdoor target range (FITA), Cull said. The complete project will include machine-made hills and valleys, new roads, a comfort station and concession stand, archery shooting towers, improvements to the Complex fishing pond, seeding of grass and the planting of several hundred new trees.

When finished, the courses will rival some of the top outdoor ranges throughout the country, Cull said.

"This is quite a project with some amazing equipment! It's awesome to see young men and women using their skills and training for their real jobs," he said.

"What an incredible program, providing help not only to a non-profit national sporting organization but also to the Midwest, South Dakota, Yankton County, and the City of Yankton."

The project will be completed in phases during the next year, Cull said.

"This project will help provide good, wholesome, family-oriented recreation and economic development," he said. "Archers should be ready for some challenging and fun courses in 2014."

Cull put out notices for the project but found he was unable to tackle the work by other means.

"For this project, it was critical that we get some type of assistance," he said. "We found that we can't afford to do (this work) unless the National Guard would do it."

During the past year, Pokorney visited the Yankton site twice and Uschuk toured the site once. The NFAA work fulfills the unit's annual two-week training mission.

That's important for the 842nd, which has completed deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, Uschuk said. The Yankton work keeps the unit sharp, preparing it for another deployment, if needed, he said.

"We maintain our proficiency of equipment and personnel," he said.

The 842nd seeks opportunities to take on new responsibilities, Pokorney said. "We are constantly growing and learning," he said.

The 842nd left Belle Fourche on June 8, taking two days for travel and preparation upon arrival in Yankton. The soldiers broke ground June 10 and have maintained a solid work schedule, starting with breakfast at 6 a.m., then work from 6:45 a.m. to 5:15 p.m. with a short lunch break.

"There are huge responsibilities that go with this mission, and the credit goes to the soldiers, who have fulfilled our highest hopes. They have made it all happen here."

Pokorney said he will remember Yankton as one of his best missions, from the outstanding accommodations to the unique learning experiences.

"There is always a great deal of satisfaction when you have people who are trained and accomplish a mission like this in a short period of time," he said.
