How often has Colton Iverson been on the road?

So much so that when I called him Monday evening after we were able to match up times, he hesitated for a few seconds when I asked him where he was.

"Airports get pretty repetitive," he said after telling me he was in Portland, awaiting a flight out of the City of Roses

The future for Iverson, a Yankton native, is looking rather rosey these days. The 7-foot center is projected by many websites to be selected in the June 27 NBA Draft, although he tries to remain humble about that po-

Iverson has already visited 14 NBA teams, including Monday's workout with the Portland Trail Blazers, and he is scheduled to work out for three more by the end of the week

Such is life for a professional prospect. Iverson goes from airport to hotel to meetings back to airports, and then it's off to a new city for the same cycle. Though you might imagine he's getting road weary or homesick, lverson was clear Monday that, no, don't worry, he's loving it. "I'm definitely taking full advantage of it," he said.

If nothing else, it's good practice for if he does get drafted next week. As an NBA player, he would constantly be traveling; always moving from one city to the next.

Whatever happens for him next week, Iverson has a whole community rooting for him.

We're a little worried about what's going on over there, but they'll take care of us," he said. "Stuff like that will help us be comfortable; getting away from all the fighting and stuff.'

For Fischbach himself, he said all his athletic exploits over the years are still a little surreal.

"It's all been a shock," he said. "Growing up, I didn't think I could be an athlete, but hopefully this shows people that you can compete at a high level."

Through all his success, Fischbach has tried to remain levelheaded.

"It's humbling," he said. "I was raised well; I definitely have that on my side. I've had great teammates and players all these vears.'
