Farm

The Senate overwhelmingly passed its version of the farm bill last week, with about $2.4 billion a year in overall cuts and a $400 million annual decrease in food stamps — one-fifth of the House bill's food stamp cuts. The White House was supportive of the Senate version but had issued a veto threat of the House bill.

If the two chambers cannot come together on a bill, farm-state lawmakers could push for an extension of the 2008 farm bill that expires in September or negotiate a new bill with the Senate and try again.

Some conservatives have suggested separating the farm programs and the food stamps into separate bills. Farm-state lawmakers have for decades added food stamps to farm bills to garner urban votes for the rural bill. But that marriage has made passage harder this year.

House Agriculture Committee Chairman Frank Lucas, R-Okla., said Thursday that the committee is assessing all its options and will continue its work in the "near future."

Just before the vote, Lucas pleaded with his colleagues' support, saying that if the measure didn't pass people would use it as an example of a dysfunctional Congress.

"If it fails today I can't guarantee you'll see in this Congress another attempt," he said.

Minnesota Rep. Collin Peterson, the senior Democrat on the House Agriculture Committee, said he believes the work requirements and a vote that scuttled a proposed dairy overhaul turned too many lawmakers against the measure.

"I had a bunch of people come up to me and say I was with you but this is it, I'm done," Peterson said after the vote.

House Speaker John Boehner, R-Ohio, voted for the bill but lobbied for the dairy amendment that caused some dairy-state lawmakers to eventually turn on the legislation. Cantor vocally supported the amendment that imposed the work requirements, coming to the House floor just before that vote and the final vote to endorse it.

Though passage has been in the balance all week, the vote against the bill was larger than many expected. When the final vote count was read, House Democrats cheered loudly, led by members of the Congressional Black Caucus who had fought the food stamp cuts.

The defeat is also a major victory for conservative taxpayer groups and environmental groups who have unsuccessfully worked against the bill for years. Those groups have aggressively lobbied lawmakers in recent weeks, hoping to capitalize on the more than 200 new members of the House since the last farm bill passed five years ago. Many of those new members are conservative Republicans who replaced moderate rural Democrats who had championed farm policy.

Those groups were emboldened after the vote.

"We need to put farm subsidies on a path to elimination and we need to devolve food stamps to the state level where they belong," said Chris Chocola, president of the conservative advocacy group Club for Growth.

Associated Press writers Jim Abrams, Alan Fram and Henry C. Jackson contributed to this report.

Drought

compared to 86 percent three months ago. In Nebraska, 68 percent of the state is experiencing those conditions, down from 100 percent three months ago.

"It's pretty significant across this region," Edwards said about the recovery from drought.

Regarding crops, Edwards said the recent precipitation has caused there to be more flooding issues than drought issues in corn planting areas. The most notable areas include some minor flooding in the James River area in northeastern South Dakota, she said.

"We now have almost too much water, and there may likely be quite a few prevented plant acres due to standing water in fields," Edwards said.

She noted that corn that has been planted is behind schedule, which she attributed mostly to a slow start in April.

Looking ahead, Edwards said the northern plains states are likely to see a drier, warmer pattern towards the end of the month.

Further down the road, forecasted conditions are less clear, she said.

From July through September, there are currently no strong indications for temperature or precipitation, Edwards said. There are also neutral ENSO conditions, with neither a La Niña or El Niño forecast for the region.

"There's not a strong climate driver that we can see in the climate models at this time," she said.
