Hunger

country who are food insecure."
He added that the term "food insecure" is new, as people are used to using the term "hunger."
"This is really about the entitlement for every American to have three meals each day," Gassen said. "If someone is food insecure, it means they don't know if they can have food for a given meal."
This study allows officials from across the country to look at food insecurity rates in each county.
"This really helps us identify the areas in South Dakota that have a greater need and we can focus more on those areas," he said.
South Dakota has experienced a slight increase in the number of people who are food insecure from the last study.
"There are about 1,000 more people in this study who are said to be food insecure," Gassen said. "However, there has also been an increase in the population of South Dakota. So you could summarize that it's a natural increase that comes with a greater population base."
Officials at Feeding South Dakota said the study confirms, to an extent, what they already knew.
"We know that there are a lot of people in the state struggling to make ends meet and put food on the table," Gassen said. "The study enables us to ... see how many meals are being missed and look at data by areas in the state."
He added that even though there is a large number of people in the state who need food assistance, officials at Feeding South Dakota will not be overwhelmed by the number.
"These statistics are what keep us up at night," Gassen said. "We want to be able to figure out better and more efficient ways to get food to different areas across the state."
He said the figure he found most interesting in the study was that the group between 130 and 185 percent of the poverty level makes up about 14 percent of those that are food insecure in South Dakota. However, the number of people who are food insecure jumps up to around 50 percent of those people who are at least 185 percent of the poverty level.
"As a whole, the numbers are significant," Gassen said. "The percentage breakout tells us different stories and shows that some families are struggling with their incomes, working poor families and people who are struggling with non-liveable wages."

He noted the fastest growing group of food insecure people in the state could be the working poor and seniors.
"There are a lot of rising costs right now, including food costs, fuel costs, utilities and medications," Gassen said. "Although these groups might make enough money to survive, in reality they don't."
Feeding South Dakota aims to help citizens in a number of different ways, including by running food pantries and food banks.
"We base the food pantry on other organizations' needs, so the community gets to decide who needs the food assistance. We just provide it," Gassen said. "The food bank provides and distributes foods to non-profits across the state. However, all of the programs we run have one thing in common — providing food assistance to individuals and families across the state."
Feeding South Dakota also runs a mobile food pantry program that distributes food straight off the truck to around a dozen communities each year.
"We understand when people are struggling to make ends meet and put food on the table, it could be the result of a number of different factors," Gassen said. "The solution to that — in simple form — comes from higher paying jobs and education. Some communities also need better access to low-cost meals, and some rural communities don't even have access to grocery stores, or grocery stores where food is more affordable."

Fighting Crohn's

SUBMITTED PHOTO

Amy, Sara, and Gene Hornstra recently completed a 13.1-mile half-marathon in Chicago for the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of America (CCFA). Through their combined efforts, they were able to raise over $5300 for research leading to improved treatment options and a cure for Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis, which CCFA describes as "painful, seldom discussed, and debilitating digestive diseases." Amy was diagnosed with Crohn's disease at the age of 18, and at age 25 was diagnosed with Crohn's-related arthritis. Many treatment options are available, but often they do not work for everyone who suffers from these diseases. Amy has done remarkably well due to advances in treatment, and has felt well enough to complete in two other half-marathons. She has raised more than $13,000 through these three marathons to support CCFA in its efforts to help others suffering from Crohn's and Colitis. A heartfelt thanks goes out to all who donated to this worthy cause. Pictured are, from left: Sara, Gene and Amy Hornstra.
