Los Angeles Stepping In On 2024 Summer Games If Boston Stumbles?

BY DAVID WHARTON

(c) 2015 Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Five months have passed since Boston defeated Los Angeles in a close race to represent the U.S. in bidding for the 2024 Summer Olympics.

It has been a difficult stretch for organizers in the Massachusetts capital, who have faced persistent opposition and watched public support dip below 40 percent amid concerns about the cost of the Games.

The bid committee has reshuffled its leadership and promised a revamped master plan on Tuesday. The clock is ticking.

U.S. Olympic Committee board members will meet in Northern California this week and, though they will probably not take decisive action now, there is increasing pressure to abandon the Boston bid.

Pulling the plug would leave two options: Submit no American city for 2024 or make a last-minute switch. Los Angeles – with an Olympic track record and an array of world-class venues – could be an easy solution, said individuals close to the situation who are not authorized to speak publicly.

“The Boston bid is in serious trouble,” said Jules Boykoff, a political science professor at Pacific University in Oregon who tracks Olympic affairs. “These next few weeks are so important.”

USOC and Los Angeles officials say they have not discussed – and will not comment on – the possibility of a switch. A Boston 2024 executive says his group remains confident as it presents a new plan to USOC directors.

“I know the board is curious,” said Richard Davey, the bid committee’s chief executive. “I don’t sense this is anything other than keeping our trusted partner informed and getting their advice.”

The U.S. has until mid-September to submit an application to the International Olympic Committee. After that, the process slows considerably, with almost two years of planning and presentations before the IOC selects a host in 2017.

That gives Boston officials a chance to fix their problems if they remain the candidate. Last week, USOC leaders took a first look at the revised bid plan and were encouraged, Davey said.

If nothing else, Boston might have bought itself time.

The bid committee has scrambled to rebound from early missteps that included a lack of communication with residents about the proposal’s details.

“Bostonians like to be heard early and often,” Davey said. “We did not get the ‘early’ part right but now we’re getting the ‘often’ part right.”

A recent poll by radio station WBUR showed only 39 percent of residents favor hosting the Games. Forty-nine percent were opposed.

Not that Olympic leaders expect overwhelming support with cities around the world becoming more sophisticated about the billions of dollars it costs to host the Games. Boykoff said: “The word is out – the Olympics aren’t the economic deal we were always told they would be.”

Still, the IOC prefers something around 70 percent approval.

“Ultimately, public support is very important,” said Michael Payne, a former IOC marketing director who also advised the successful London 2012 and Rio de Janeiro 2016 bids. “Two years from now, the IOC wants to know that a majority of the local population thinks hosting the Olympic Games is a good idea.”

last faced the Reds on July 27, 2011, while with the New York Mets.

Brewers: RHP Jimmy Nelson (4-8) aims for his seventh quality start and first ever against the Phillies in Philadelphia on Monday.

MOLITOR BOBBLEHEAD
 Molitor was honored by his former team with a bobblehead. “For them to do one for the visiting manager, I thought that was a pretty nice gesture,” he said. “The players are giving me a hard time, which makes it fun.”

different levels, so it’s been positive.”

James led the short-handed Cavaliers back to the finals in June and put on a breath-taking performance to make the Golden State sweat it out for six games before Steph Curry and Co. captured the Warriors’ first title since 1975. With Love and Kyrie Irving out with injuries, James averaged 35.8 points, 13.3 rebounds, 8.8 assists and almost 46 minutes in the series.

If James signs another two-year contract with a player option on the second year, it would allow him to reap the financial windfall that is expected when the NBA’s new television contract kicks in next summer and sends the salary cap sky-rocketing.

Teams can start negotiating with players on July 1 and sign them to contracts beginning July 8.

James’ deal will likely be tabled while the Cavaliers address Thompson, Love and Shumpert, who is a restricted free agent.
