FLOOD

areas buy insurance. Homeowners obtain the policies through private insurance agents, but the federal government pays its administrative costs and damage claims. In Fargo, N.D., and neighboring Moorhead, Minn., last year's flooding along the Red River is still in the minds of homeowners, and this year's deep snowpack and saturated soil make for ideal conditions for heavy flooding, especially if there's heavy spring rain. On Monday, volunteers filled sandbags to prepare for what's expected to be major flooding this year. The forecast is less dire but still ominous for parts of other states, including South Dakota, Iowa, Illinois and Missouri. "There's a heightened interest (in insurance) this year with what's going on in our area, up here in Fargo-Moorhead," said Dean Thompson, an agent at Warner and Company Insurance Agency in Fargo. "Last fall's moisture and the moisture in the snow this year and the snowpack this year has people concerned," Thompson said. The costs of flood insurance vary and depend on the location within a flood plain and value of the property and contents. As of mid-February, FEMA said there were about 4,000 flood insurance policies in South Dakota and about 13,000 in North Dakota. It put the average policy cost at $540 a year.

bring in less money than regular students, the district ends up with less money to educate all its students, Oster said. Also, small schools often have an equal number of students transferring in and out, he said. Under the bill, they would have lost more money for students going out than they received for those coming in.
