or oil tanks that are on airport property?" he said. "This is an indirect fuel tax, and I believe it's in violation with FAA rules."

Nelson explained that the rule would be discriminatory because it only applies to those who self-fuel, and since the fee is the same regardless of tank size or frequency of use, those with smaller tanks are essentially getting taxed at a much higher rate.

Another option raised involves a "fuel farm" at the airport, whereby aircraft owners can lease a space in a designated area set aside specifically for multiple fuel tanks.

"At first, I thought, 'No way, no (fuel tank permit) fees,'" said Jake Hoffner of Yankton, who runs an aerial crop spraying business. "But if the airport moves to a fuel farm system and eliminated self-fueling (at the hangar), I'll have to leave the airport."

Though no vote was taken regarding the fuel farm option, Specht said if one was established, it wouldn't necessarily eliminate self-fueling by those who already have tanks by their own hangars.

In response to the objections, Commissioner Nancy Wenande moved to table the motion until more research could be conducted to determine what would be a fair and reasonable fee for self-fueling, but her motion died, and the resolution to charge a tank permit fee passed.

"They didn't answer where this money will go and for what purpose," Nelson said after the meeting. "If you take it out of the pocket of those that self-service and put it into the city's fuel pocket, that's probably unjust discrimination. We need to do some research. There are a lot of things that are unclear yet."

Other items addressed at Monday's meeting included granting Airport Acres Mobile Home Court permission to allow long-term campers to lease space within the court on a temporary basis, and approval of concrete removal and replacement projects to take place at various locations throughout the city's alleys and streets.

— any time at all.

"Then kids get this view of, 'That's how I'm supposed to run my life because that's what's been done,'" Johnson said. "Then you throw in a genetic disposition to drinking, and that does make it very hard to make those choices."

The parents may also intervene in negative ways if their children have been charged with underage consumption.

Yankton police officer Jacob Zajic said he has been yelled at more than once by parents for arresting kids on underage drinking charges.

State Trooper Joel Peterson has had similar experiences.

"I've actually had parents that have contacted me after the (incidents) and said, 'Hey, the kids aren't doing anything wrong. They're staying out of trouble,'" Peterson said. "The problem is that they're endangering themselves first and foremost, and second, if they get behind the wheel, they're endangering the other people that are out there."

Apart from legal ramifications, major health problems can result from underage drinking, including brain development.

"We find there's permanent changes that take place in the brain because of alcohol use, and those changes aren't reversible," Mathis said.

Hunhoff said that last year, 117 people under age 20 were arrested for alcohol offenses, and 63 for drug offenses.

Despite this, he said the total juvenile arrests have gone down steadily over the years.

"I hope that continues, because I think it's the brightest spot we have in Yankton County, as far as the criminal justice system goes," Hunhoff said. "... There are some good signs in Yankton County, and I think it's (due to) things like these forums and the people that work hard in treatment facilities and law enforcement everywhere."

Yankton School District administrator Bob Winter added, "We need parents' help... The schools cannot do it by themselves. The law enforcement people cannot do it by themselves."
