Increased Flows Planned At Gavins Point Dam During Test

From P&D Staff Reports

As part of the ongoing rehabilitation and repair of the damage from the Missouri River flood of 2011, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers will temporarily increase discharges out of Gavins Point Dam Tuesday.

The purpose of the spillway flow test is to gain baseline information on the current condition of the spillway.

Beginning around 7:30 a.m., releases will be diverted from the powerhouse to the spillway. The total discharge will be ramped up from the current 14,000 cubic feet per second (cfs) to 26,000 cfs.

The discharge may be increased to 40,000 cfs for short periods of time, depending on the responses observed at the lower discharge rates.

The total test period is not expected to exceed eight hours.

At the completion of the test, total project releases will be reduced to 14,000 cfs in accordance with scheduled daily releases.

Repair work on Gavins Point Dam has entailed additional investigations into the foundation conditions underlying the concrete slabs located immediately downstream of the spillway structure. Subsurface investigations are nearing completion.

They included the installation of pressure transducers beneath the spillway chute to assess and monitor uplift pressures that may develop during operation of the spillway.

"Prior to completing the last phase of the scheduled interim repairs, it is necessary to obtain baseline information regarding the current condition of the spillway," said Geotechnical Engineer Steve Butler. "Gaining that information will help us determine whether additional interim repairs are warranted. It will help us assess the long term reliability of the spillway's existing uplift design."

Impacts to river stages from a peak discharge of 40,000 cfs are expected to be as follows at Yankton: Residents will begin to see a rise within one hour after the flow increase; an approximate maximum stage increase of 4.4 feet; and the peak stage should occur at approximately 4 p.m.

"Next week's forecast calls for mild temperatures and near normal runoff, which makes for ideal conditions for the test," Butler said. "We will monitor river and weather conditions between now and next week and, if conditions change, the test will be modified or postponed to prevent adverse impacts to river users or adjacent landowners."

has been added to the preschool as well, Buxcel said.

"We didn't have computers when I first started," she said. "Now, children have computers in the classroom and a smart table that we got last year."

Classes include weekly Bible stories, weekly pastor visits, "Jesus time," creative art activities and activities to help cognitive and motor skills.

"Our children learn through play," Buxcel said. "There's a lot of hands-on academic learning that goes on."

Stevens added that the curriculum has evolved throughout the years to help prepare the children for kindergarten, as well as to make sure the students remain focused.

"We like to bring out a lot of different things to keep them interested," she said.

While providing a Christ-centered education is Stevens' main priority, she said she also takes pride in the relationships she develops with her students.

"I just love being greeted with smiles and hugs in the morning. It's just the most wonderful thing," she said. "And when the kids go home — that last hug you get before they go home — it's just so special."

As part of its 20th anniversary celebration, St. John's Preschool will present a special display — "20 Years of Faith, Family and Foundations" — during its observance of this year's National Lutheran Schools Week. From March 11-15, the school will line its hallways with 20 years of photographs of past preschool students.

"I think our church members who are either younger and have been here or the parents who have had children here will enjoy looking back on those memories," Stevens said.

Buxcel agreed, saying some of her proudest moments have come when she speaks with former students and parents.

"Parents come back when their children are in high school or middle school and say their children still remember being in preschool, and that it was their favorite part of their education," she said. "To me, that means a lot."

In recognition of its 20-year anniversary, St. John's Preschool is offering a 25 percent tuition discount to church members and a 20 percent discount to non-members for next school year. For more information, contact Stevens at 605-665-7337.
