state's Legislature, governorship and other federal offices. Johnson was seen as competitive, despite the state's GOP tilt, in part because of his reserved manner and independent streak, as well as his committee chairmanship, which gives Johnson Senate clout as well as a robust fundraising base.

Still, Democrats rejected the notion that Johnson's retirement opens the door for a GOP senator. In last November's election, some Republican Senate candidates who appeared to be the heavy favorites ended up losing to Democratic rivals — including Rick Berg, who lost to Heidi Heitkamp in neighboring North Dakota.

South Dakota Democratic Chairman Ben Nesselhuf noted Democrats' successes over the past 30 years, including former Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle.

"I reject the idea that somehow the Republicans has a lock on this state," Nesselhuf said. "By no means is this an impossible task, or even improbable."

Republican Mike Rounds, a popular former two-term governor, has announced his candidacy for the seat, and has been campaigning since last year. Rounds declined to comment on Johnson's retirement.

Johnson's office issued a press release Monday saying the senator will hold a press conference in his hometown of Vermillion at 3 p.m. today (Tuesday) at the University of South Dakota's Al Neuharth Media Center.

Aware that Johnson might decide to retire, Democrats in South Dakota and nationally have discussed possible successors on the ticket, including Johnson's son Brendan, South Dakota's U.S. attorney. The younger Johnson Monday said in an interview that he was unaware of his father's decision and declined to discuss whether he would seek the office.

Former U.S. Rep. Stephanie Herseth Sandlin, a contemporary of Brendan Johnson and another heir to a South Dakota Democratic legacy, also is looking at running. A granddaughter of former South Dakota Gov. Ralph Herseth, Herseth Sandlin served six years in the U.S. House before being defeated for re-election in 2010.

Action within Johnson's party is expected quickly. An open Senate seat is rare in South Dakota, and Republicans have gained an upper hand in the state, controlling the governorship, the Legislature, its other Senate seat and its lone U.S. House seat.

Brendan Johnson, appointed U.S. attorney in 2009, has never held elected office and faced questions about his father's involvement in the confirmation process. Assets for the younger Johnson include his father's advisers and donor base.

Herseth Sandlin also has an in-tact network and following in South Dakota, but she could face some problems in a potential primary with Johnson. She opposed to the 2010 Affordable Care Act, a position that is out of step with a majority of party loyalists.

throughout the weekend.

Citing the event's success, Frosch said that Yankton has done a "fantastic job" with the tournament the past three years.

"The thing is, Yankton has the best basketball facilities in the state as far as we're concerned," she said. "Yankton has set the bar very high for this tournament, and those are big shoes for anybody to fill."

One concern the SOSD has had is Yankton's lodging accommodations, Frosch said. As the tournament has grown, the city has not been able to provide enough hotel rooms for individuals visiting for the tournament, she said.

"We've had to put people in Vermillion, but not once has any of them complained about staying there," Frosch said. "The hotel situation is an issue, but we have worked around it."

Scheve added that she was told that location was also considered in the decision.

"They have a number of teams that travel from both the east and west, so having it in the center of the state was an advantage for them," she said.

Despite any concerns the SOSD has, Frosch said there is a good chance the tournament will return to Yankton in the future.

"I want to thank Yankton for being such a great host," she said. "I told (Yankton's) committee to sit back and get rested, because hopefully we'll be back."
