onstage athlete on tour. Since 2006 Halpin has transformed the singer into a human jack-in-the-box, dropping her from 80 feet and launching her from bungee cords — and these are just opening numbers. Silent House has also been the creative force behind recent tours from Perry, Sade and Swift.

But when is it too much? The ferocious choreography of Lady Gaga's recent tour led to a hip injury that required surgery and the cancellation of remaining dates. During Pink's 2010 Funhouse Summer Carnival tour the singer had to be rushed to the hospital after she was flung into the audience barricade because of an improperly attached harness. The risky stunt is still part of Pink's show.

"That injury was a very real injury ... (but) if she does something and it's not physically demanding enough or hard enough, she's almost not interested," Halpin said. "That's what keeps her live shows interesting. She likes to test herself. Her shows are tough because she wants them to be tough."

Others are willing to take risks too. When Beyonce opens her Mrs. Carter World Tour in April, fans can expect her to fly above the arena to a secondary stage. Swift's current Red Tour also sends the singer soaring over the crowd.

Even Underwood brought spectacle to her recent Blown Away tour. The country-pop singer and her band levitated over the crowd on a glass-bottomed platform that broke away from the main stage. A previous trek included a dress that served as a projection screen, which allowed her to do the unthinkable — focus on the music.

"I just like to stand still and sing sometimes," she said after reusing the dress for a recent Grammy performance. "So this was the best way I could do that and still create something very visually attention-capturing and beautiful."

Nearly 30 years into her touring career Madonna is still breaking ground, and last year's MDNA Tour saw the singer push physical boundaries. Madonna tapped Cirque du Soleil artistic director Michel Laprise to direct the show that was an astonishing display of technological innovation that found the singer engaged in near-extreme sports that included scaling a wall and slack-lining. At the center of the production were 36 hydraulically controlled cubes, which Madonna would jump on and straddle as they rose and reshaped the stage.

"Madonna is her own creation, so I could not give her an environment that would be fixed. It had to be something that's unpredictable and surprising — like she's been the last 30 years," Laprise said.

The over-the-top approach worked. The concert was the top-grossing tour in the States last year, despite tickets that cost more than $300.
