Ready For Spring? Honestly, Not Really Yet

As I was covering Mount Marty College's home baseball game against Dakota State on Wednesday — my first baseball game of the spring — a parent of the Lancer players from the region asked me if I was ready for this spring to get rolling. I admitted to him that no, I really am not. First off, am I ready for spring-like weather? Of course. I am more than ready to hang up the winter coat for the year in favor of my Honorary Y-Club jacket or my Lakers sweatshirt. (Even though they're not good this year, I still have to rep the Lakers every once in a while.) Or better yet, not need a jacket at all. I would be more than happy to leave the stocking cap in the car in favor of one of the many baseball caps sitting in the back window of my car. But when I look at all the work that needs to be done in the next six days, I would be more than happy to have an extra week to do it.

Much of that work has to do with spring itself. The Press & Dakotan Spring Sports Preview goes to press on Tuesday, and will be in print later in the week, April 4 in the Vermillion Plain Talk and April 5 in the Press & Dakotan. I personally have four stories I need to write over the next 48 hours, and most of those interviews are today. This coming weekend, we have the annual Roger Haas youth basketball tournament. I'm sure I'll spend plenty of time over the weekend taking photos of future Bucks, Gazelles, Warriors, Eagles, Highlanders and a few dozen other schools in the region and beyond. There is also home Yankton baseball, home Mount Marty women's tennis and home Mount Marty softball this weekend. That doesn't even factor in a new project for me this spring, teaching a class in Mount Marty's Center for Active Learners program on sports in literature. (Contact Andy Henricksen at MMC to sign up.) I joked with the parent that I could really use a snow storm in the next couple of days to ease up some of the regular work and allow me to focus on the other stuff. I was completely joking about that, but it would come in handy. Still, like I said, I'd rather have the nice weather. Even if it means I'm getting busy again.

He posted the second-fastest league times in both events this past season with top times of 6.87 and 21.97, respectively. Overall this season, Kovash had six top-three finishes with two victories. Twins To Use Metal Detectors At Target Field

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — The Minnesota Twins will be phasing in walk-through metal detectors at Target Field starting with their home opener on April 7. The Twins announced on Tuesday that they will start using the security devices at some gates when they open against the Oakland Athletics. It's part of Major League Baseball's initiative to have a standardized fan screening system in place at every ballpark by 2015. The Twins say they expect all gates to have metal detectors by early May. Twins senior vice president of operations Matt Hoy says the team believes walk-through detectors are "the most minimally-invasive, fastest and most effective way" to keep Target Field safe. Fans who do not wish to pass through a metal detector will have the option of being checked with a hand-held device.

'Clones

According to Iowa State student Joe Kukulski, a co-chairman for the student fan group Cyclone Alley, the fact that this team has made a concerted effort to bond with the community out in public and on social media has only added to its popularity. "They're very down to earth guys, just like Hoiberg," Kukulski said. "They're not afraid to be themselves." The fans haven't been afraid to show their appreciation for this team, either. The students organized a mass flop to heckle Oklahoma State rival Marcus Smart, and those who traveled to Kansas City put Band-Aids over their eyes en masse to support Niang after a gruesome head injury against Kansas in the Big 12 semifinals. It was all in good fun, though — which the Cyclones are having a lot of lately. "I think they're a happy group of guys. They've got smiles on their faces," said former Iowa State All-American Gary Thompson, who has maintained close ties with both Hoiberg and the program. "They're enjoying playing the game, and I think Fred has made the team that way with the way he coaches."
