School Talk: College 529s Do Their Job

GOMA HERALD-STATE (March 2) — Remember President Barack Obama’s address on his 16-year-old son’s earnings in College 529 accounts? The college savings plans are designed to help students finance their education, and they offer several advantages over traditional savings accounts. First, contributions to a 529 plan are tax-deductible, and the earnings grow tax-free. Second, withdrawals for qualified higher education expenses are also tax-free. Finally, 529 plans are portable, allowing you to use the savings in the account to pay for education expenses at any qualifying college or university.

Social media said they were already a political force. They were not.

You can’t use “ignorantly” or “black hole” or “think in the armor” without provoking a quest for explanation or simply a rejection of language. The fast-food, call-campaigning bimbos don’t want to use the proper language. They insist on improper language. They insist on an upbringing in yesteryear. They want to rage against the digital future.

The backlash against Common Core didn’t catch the ultimate attention at the White House. It got caught by the Department of Education, which appoints the people to oversee the Common Core standards. By the way, the Department of Education is the entity that was supposed to implement the Common Core. In 2013, the Department of Education was supposed to implement the Common Core, but the Department of Education was supposed to implement the Common Core.

Meanwhile, the Daugaard administration killed two pieces of legislation that would have allowed the state to continue implementing Common Core. If the Oklahoma Legislature can’t stop Common Core, it will stop Common Core.

I think that’s not even true. There were blanks in rows along with the other students in the school band, selecting at Atlantic City’s players and choosing for Holy Spirit players. And in the end, the Holy Spirit players didn’t get the game. They didn’t get the game.
