BANKS

the legislation late Thursday.

Two amendments stood between the bill and final Senate passage. One would ban commercial banks from carrying out speculative trades for their own profit. The other would exempt auto dealers from oversight by a new consumer protection bureau.

Under an agreement between Republicans and Democrats, the fate of the bank trading limits, a Democratic amendment, depended on the car dealer measure, a mostly Republican proposal.

Republicans considered dropping their regulatory exception for car dealers, in a move aimed at rejecting the bank trading restrictions. The Obama administration said it wanted most to assure that auto dealers would be regulated like other lenders.

Sen. Jeff Merkley, D-Ore., said that without the restriction on bank trading, banks are tempted to steer too many resources into "high-risk investing," leaving too little for conventional loans to businesses and families.

The two functions, he said, "don't belong under the same roof."

Three Republicans — Scott Brown of Massachusetts and Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine — voted to end debate and move ahead on the bill. Two Democrats — Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Maria Cantwell of Washington — voted with other Republicans against it.

Democrats succeeded in breaking through the Republican block by winning Brown's backing. The Massachusetts Republican, who had voted against ending debate on Wednesday, met with Reid Thursday morning to voice his concerns regarding the bill's effect on Massachusetts banks such as State Street and insurance firms such as MassMutual. House Financial Services Committee chairman Barney Frank, also of Massachusetts, weighed in Thursday with letters to Reid offering his own guarantees that the final bill would resolve Brown's concerns.

Cantwell and Feingold continued to object to the bill. Cantwell protested her inability to get a vote on an amendment that she said would toughen regulation of complex securities known as derivatives. Feingold has said the bill does not go far enough to restrain Wall Street.
