

Obama

More broadly, before a polite diplomatic audience at the State Department, Obama sought to clarify the U.S. role toward a part of the world undergoing a transformation. He implored the American people to see that it is worth devoting U.S. might and money to help stabilize a dangerous region and help people fighting for freedom.

"There must be no doubt that the United States of America welcomes change that advances self-determination and opportunity," the president said. "Yes, there will be perils that accompany this moment of promise. But after decades of accepting the world as it is in the region, we have a chance to pursue the world as it should be."

It was Obama's explicit endorsement of the 1967 borders that changed the dynamic.

The U.S., the international community and even past Israeli governments have endorsed the idea of an agreement based on the 1967 lines, but Obama's new emphasis was a clear prodding for Israel to act.

The way Obama put it means the U.S. now accepts 1967 lines, with land swaps, as the basis for the borders of a Palestinian state — and not just that such a result would be the desired outcome of negotiations, as had been the U.S. stand.

The United States insists, too, that Israel end up with a safe, secure state without fear of attack from Palestinians.

In a cool statement released late Thursday in Jerusalem, Netanyahu rejected a full withdrawal from the West Bank, saying the 1967 lines would leave major Jewish settlements outside Israel. It was unclear whether Obama's stand would be enough to persuade the Palestinians to drop their push for U.N. recognition of their statehood.

In the run-up to the president's speech, the White House had sought to downplay the role of the Mideast peace standoff in his address, emphasizing instead other elements such as his proposed financial support for Egypt and Tunisia, two nations that have risen up and embraced democracy. But the address only served to underscore how central the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is to the stability of the whole region and the political interests of the United States.

Obama sought to give perspective to a five-month period in which thousands have died in protests for human rights, two countries' leaders have been toppled, others are teetering, the U.S. has been drawn into an armed conflict in Libya and America has launched a stunning, successful mission to find and kill Osama bin Laden in Pakistan. The president tried to minimize bin Laden's reach even in death, saying his al-Qaida vision of destruction had already been deemed a "dead end" by those wanting a better life.

Moving country by country, Obama offered his toughest words yet for Syrian President Bashar Assad, in whom the U.S. has lost hope as a reformer given his government's bloody crackdown on dissidents. Obama did not call for Assad to step down but did accuse him of murdering his people. "The Syrian people have shown their courage in demanding a transition," Obama said. "President Assad now has a choice: He can lead that transition or get out of the way."

One 24-year-old Syrian said the U.S. president was too late.

"It's too bad hundreds of people died before he made the speech," said Mustafa, who fled the coastal town of Banias, which has seen some of the biggest protests in recent weeks, and who did not give his surname for fear of reprisals. "I think it's too late for Assad to lead a peaceful transition to democracy after all that happened."

In seizing his own Mideast moment, Obama offered a speech that was in some ways notable for what he did not mention.

While critical of autocracy throughout the Mideast, he failed to mention the region's largest, richest and arguably most repressive nation, U.S. ally Saudi Arabia.

Nor did he mention Jordan, a staunch U.S. ally that has a peace deal with Israel. Also left out was the United Arab Emirates, the wealthy, pro-American collection of mini-states on the Persian Gulf.

The Difference Between Hearing And Listening

BY PASTOR DAVE LUND,
Associate Pastor, Trinity Lutheran

I was sitting at a restaurant with some colleagues the other day, and while we were eating our meal together we were having a very difficult time hearing what the others were saying. The reason for this was that the restaurant was busy and quite noisy. This started me thinking, "How often do we miss, or fail to hear something important?"

There is a distinct difference between hearing and listening. Hearing just involves receiving sound, listening includes trying to understand what that sound really means. It is all too easy to hear someone or something and think that you understand it, but in fact you may have missed something of the utmost importance which means that you did not understand at all which usually leads to some sort of disagreement.

The point is listening, in all aspects of communication and life, is of the utmost importance. Listening to understand does not mean listening to agree, but in doing so it naturally involves showing respect to the speaker. This is what is needed in our daily life, to listen in order to understand. When we listen in this way we are following Christ's command to love one another. Loving one another does not mean agreeing with each other, it does not even mean always liking one another, but it does involve treating the other as you yourself would like to be treated.

Our community is facing an issue which has set neighbor against neighbor, friend against friend and family member against family member. There are reasons on both sides of this issue for why people feel strongly one way or the other. The thing that I have found lacking, in general, is the willingness to listen in order to understand.

Remember this is to understand, not necessarily to agree with each other. There has been a distinct lack of respect shown and I find this to be tragic, sad, and unchristian. Regardless of what your feelings are on this school opt-out issue the person on the other side deserves your respect.

So as we come to the vote this next week remember listen to understand those you speak with. Strive to show respect to all that you come in contact with. Remember that the person who you are talking to, or arguing with, is also a child of God. And whatever the outcome of the issue, please find ways of showing the love of Christ to all of the people of our great community.
