With Williams Out The Door, Where Does USD Go Next With Women's Basketball Program? BY JEREMY HOECK

ieremv.hoeck@vankton.net

With Ryun Williams gone from the University of South Dakota women's basketball program, where do the Coyotes turn?

Naturally, that's the popular question right now. You've got to think USD is a very attractive stop right now, with the program buzzing from back-to-back post-season appearances, NCAA post-season eligibility looming next season, a strong recruiting class on the way and a basketball arena on the short-term time

With those factors in mind. athletic director David Sayler said Monday that his search will cast "one of the widest nets you'll ever

And in the sense that last fall's football coaching search was an unusual situation that landed USD Joe Glenn, this new endeavor will provide a unique challenge.

Does USD zero in on an assistant with Division Lexperience? (That could include interim coach Ryan Larsen, who spent four seasons as an assistant with Williams. You might be able to toss in Jaime Berry, a Watertown native who recently resigned as an assistant at North Dakota State).

Does USD look at current Division II coaches? (That could include University of Sioux Falls coach Travis Traphagen).

Or does USD really go outside the box and look at a successful high school coach? (Some have mentioned Sioux Falls Washington's Nate Malchow, though you could also throw in Roosevelt's Chris Clark, a USD grad).

Most likely though, it'll be a name outside the normal avenues, someone with the energy and passion to guide a program through the Summit League. Someone who can lure kids to Vermillion, away from other area schools. Someone who knows the game and can implement a certain style.
