wife, Shirley. Using a smartphone or GPS, about 65 people searched for 172 hidden containers — or caches — placed within a 25-mile radius of Yankton.

The Dangers' incorporation of Star Wars Day into their geocaching event showed all the wisdom of Yoda.

They were far from alone in embracing the Star Wars theme. Saturday's "flash mob" at Meridian Bridge joined a worldwide celebration of the officially unofficial holiday.

Saturday's local gathering didn't see the likes of Han Solo, Luke Skywalker, Princess Leia, Obi-Wan Kenobi, R2D2, C3PO, Yoda, Chewbacca the Wookiee or Jabba the Hutt. However, Shirley Dangler donned a Darth Vader costume as she journeyed to the dark side.

Norfolk, Neb., resident Jason Judd, who organized the local "flash mob" gathering, stepped forward in his Darth Vader mask.

He challenged Shirley Dangler for supremacy of the galaxy — or at least the bridge.

"Jason was going to set up his own flash mob in Norfolk today (Saturday), the same time as ours. It was a total coincidence," Will Dangler said. "When he heard about our flash mob, he decided to join forces with us rather than compete against us."

So, the force truly was with them. Judd lined up the Star Wars Day throng for a group shot on the bridge. The mem-said. "It was one of the best things that ever happened to me."

So much time has passed that even her children say they weren't completely aware of their mother's accomplishments.

Their grandmother, Virginia, was the one to usually share stories with them, according to Erin Plihal, who graduated from the University of Southern California last year, and is now living in Omaha and pursuing studio art.

"Mom is pretty focused on her career, so we would mostly hear stories from other people," Erin said. "We would find her old track shoes or something, and that would spur it."

Plihal's children, like the crowd Saturday at Howard Wood Field, learned something about their mother.

"I just found out today that she set her record at UCLA," Erin said. "It's nice to have this to learn more about her."

Even if so much time has passed, getting a chance to re-live some of those athletic glory days was a welcome opportunity, Sally Plihal said.

"My track and field days were a wonderful time in my life," she said. "I loved when I competed. It was very enjoyable."

bers carefully squeezed together, holding signs and light sabers to send their collective energy into the universe.

"We are gathering at the same time as others around the world (for a Star Wars flash mob)," Judd said. "For example, flash mobs in the Eastern time zone are gathering at 1 p.m., while flash mobs in the Central Time Zone, like here in Yankton, are gathered at noon."

Judd wasn't sure of exact numbers, but he said hundreds of flash mobs are held in dozens of countries around the globe in conjunction with the annual Star Wars Day.

"One year, they held a flash mob in Europe that drew about 550 people," he said.

The Norfolk man came prepared for Saturday's flash mob. Besides his Darth Vader mask, he brought his own light saber as a tribute to the famous Star Wars battle scenes.

As Saturday's flash mob broke up, a Yankton father and son stayed behind to enjoy the moment.

Kurt Hauser said he became involved with geocaching — and in turn, the Star Wars flash mob — because of 15-year-old son Nick's avid pursuit of the hobby.

"We've done geocaches in Iowa, and we did one in Wisconsin when we were on vacation," Nick said.

So, with the success of Saturday's event, will The Empire Strike Back and the Star Wars characters return for another flash mob in Yankton?

Even if Darth Vader and his cohorts don't pay another visit, the Dangers and their fellow geocachers enjoyed a weekend that was out of this world.

for governor of Minnesota. He received a B.A. in accounting and business administration from the University of Minnesota in 1970.

"You have an analytical way of thinking that is 100 percent unique to you. You have a singular way of solving problems and creating options, and so does everyone else in this room," Vekich told the graduates. "That is why I say, 'you are not special.' But you are vitally important. You have a mixture of talents and skills, strengths and abilities that are desperately needed in this world. You have something to give, or discover, or write, or create that only you can contribute.

"Important thing number two: You have what it takes to succeed," he said. "You've just succeeded in finishing college and you are about to start succeeding in a bunch of other things."

He told the graduates that they are better educated, richer, more widely traveled and smarter than any generation of this world.

"You have what it takes to succeed. So what does success mean to you? How would you define it?" Vekich said.

He noted that the late Steve Jobs is noted as a successful genius who changed the way the people throughout the world live their lives.

"But what about Steve Jobs' famous temper tantrums? His habit of verbally attacking people who served him at coffee bars? Publicly firing employees before an audience of their peers? Is this the part that you want your success to look like?" Vekich asked.

"I would like to suggest that success, no matter how you define it, has to be bigger than simply achieving your goal. It must include others, which brings me to important thing number three: Significance is better than success," he said. "If success is what you do to achieve your goals, significance is what you do to help others achieve their goals."

Significance, he said, lasts forever. "When you positively change the life of another human being, that person in turn impacts the life of another, who influences another, and on it goes," Vekich said. "Significance satisfies your soul. The thirst for success is never quenched. It grows stronger and stronger with each new achievement. But significance satisfies the deepest longing of the human soul.

"On your graduation day, I'd like to invite you, right from the beginning in your quest for success to pursue significance," he told the graduates.
