Words cannot express our appreciation for all the support we have received during the loss of our mother, grandma, and great grandma, Evelyn "Mike" Klein.

A special thank you to Dr. Riley Eckmann, Sunny Nagengast, and Kevin Lauck (Bloomfield Medical Clinic) for all your caring and assistance. We would like to thank Dr. Lori Hansen and nurse Jean (Yankton Medical Clinic) for all their care over the years.

Mom missed her home at the Sunset View Assisted Living Center where she was given such awesome care by Mark Luger and his caring staff. The staff at Good Samaritan Nursing Home and Ascera care provided excellent care for our mom during her final days with us.

Special thanks to Pastor Tim Koester for his visits, and for the wonderful words of comfort at her visitation and memorial services. His message at the funeral helped us to be comforted and assured of God's grace for "Mike". We also want to thank the members of St. Mark's church who brought food and served the meal following her funeral service. We appreciate the respect and support shown to our family by Brockhaus Funeral Home.

Steve and Bette Keiser have been great neighbors and friends to our mom and brought food for the family on Wed. evening at the church. Thank you to all the family and friends for the food, cards, plants, beautiful flowers, memorial gifts, phone calls, and words of comfort. It is heartwarming to know how much Mike was loved by so many. This is a great comfort to our family.

Rain

"The monitor has some unwritten rules and really can only improve an area by one drought category each week," Edwards said. "So it may take some time for improvements to show up in the drought monitor, but I expect improvements to be made again this week."

She added that the eastern side of South Dakota has made big gains this spring, which has led to a dramatically improved drought situations. However, Edwards noted that drought impacts could emerge quickly on the west side of the state as the area enters its dry summer season.

Despite the heavy rainfall across the area in recent days, Edwards said it's still too early to project crop yields for this season.

"Some of the fields that have been damaged could still have their crops be replanted," she said. "Farmers should consult their crop insurance agents on the details on what replanting might mean for crop insurance coverage."

The weather forecast this week calls for more rain for Yankton, which could pose problems for farmers. In fact, the National Weather Service gas issued a flash flood watch for an area that includes Clay, Turner and Union counties through early Thursday morning.

"Conditions aren't going to let up, at least not in the short term," she said. "The additional rainfall creates issues with crop insurance because some crops might not qualify for coverage. Hopefully farmers planted most of their corn in the previous week or two."

Connie Strunk, SDSU Extension plant pathology field specialist said corn and soybeans can generally handle about 48 hours of being completely submerged under water before they start to decline.

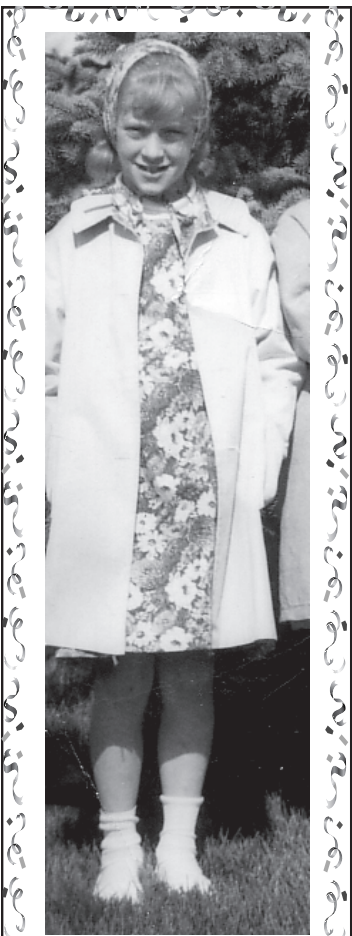

"However, that 48 hours number is with overcast skies and cooler temperatures," she said. "The sun and warmer temperatures can change that number and can change the outlook on plants."

Strunk said farmers looking to replant crops after the rainfall need to check with their crop insurance agents and look into what herbicides they put down last fall to see if there are any restrictions on crop rotation and replanting.

"If it continues to rain like it has been, we're really starting to get close to the end of full days of crop insurance coverage," Strunk said. "Some farmers in some areas also have not been able to get into the fields yet because it has been so wet."

In addition to the rainfall only making impacts on farmers and the drought, releases from Gavins Point Dam have also been reduced following the heavy rain.

"Gavins Point releases have been reduced over the last few days from 24,000 cubic feet per second (cfs) to 15,000 cfs," Jody Farhat, chief of the Missouri River Water Management Division, said in a statement. "Heavy rain across the basin increased flows on many of the tributaries below the system of reservoirs. Gavins Point releases are scheduled to be reduced to 12,000 cfs Wednesday morning." Releases were reduced by 3,000 cfs from Sunday to Tuesday.

The South Dakota senator also said there likely will be a spirited discussion when Congress reconvenes concerning the use of drones against terrorist targets.

In a speech last week, President Barack Obama defended the use of drones as an alternative to military intervention. He called drones the course of action least likely to result in the loss of innocent human life. The president admitted that drone strikes raise troubling legal questions. He even acknowledged that critics of drone strikes had a point, but he insisted that drone strikes continue, albeit with stronger safeguards and more transparency.

"I think there is going to be a pretty robust discussion about it," Thune said. "There already has been, but the president himself, in his speech, has sort of pulled back a little bit, and looked at redefining the parameters for use of drones from now requiring an imminent, continuing threat to the U.S. as opposed to a significant threat. It's a different standard that he is trying to put into place, and Congress, obviously, is very concerned about collateral damage, civilian casualties, and how the program is being used and what it is attempting to accomplish."

The senator said he welcomes increased dialogue and scrutiny of this issue in Congress.

"This is an element of our foreign policy, it's an element of our military power, and we need to make sure that we're using those elements of our military power in a way that accomplish objectives that are vital to America's national security interests," he said. "We must also do it in a way that minimizes collateral damage and civilian casualties."

On the domestic front, Thune held little hope for Congress finding a solution to federal fiscal issues, including a way to end the budget sequester, anytime soon.

"If there was something to replace the sequester, to turn it off, if we could figure out how to proportion the reductions of spending elsewhere in the budget, it could happen," he said. "Democrats in the Congress want to see tax increases used to turn off the sequester. It looks to me right now that it (ending the sequester) could be very hard."

The best that Congress may be able to do, he added, is be more flexible when it comes to formulating guidelines for devoting funds to federal programs in the future.

"I guess the best thing I think we can hope for in the short term is that when Congress does appropriation bills this year that they provide the optimum amount of flexibility so that agencies that are dealing with the sequester can move funds around," Thune said. "The sequester, unfortunately, was pretty prescriptive in how it was designed and so I think if we're going to continue to have these cuts in place, let's allow the agencies that have to implement them to do it in a way that's rational and makes sense."
