who abandoned the series be enticed by a new mystery to return? The ratings noticeably fell off during the progression of the second season.

AMC President Charlie Collier said that the controversy surrounding “The Killing” put network executives in a tough spot, and that canceling the show was “very difficult.”

“Mixed emotions came with that decision,” Collier said. “It was made based on different inputs and competing needs. But when it came down to it, we just couldn’t shake these characters. We were passionate about the storytelling, passionate about the show and we kept hearing from the core passionate audience. Now we have a new case, with all our MVPs back. With a new case brings new opportunity.”

Enos said she was thrilled to step back into Linden’s skin: “Once we were back, it felt like no time has passed. Veena has such a strong driving sense of the story, and Joel and I love working together. This is the best crew I’ve ever worked with — such a warm, generous group of people.”

The actress is still puzzled about the show’s past struggles and the disenchantment of some of the fans.

“It was so strange,” she said. “The first season was such a love affair. Then it became so baffling. The reality is, I was much more proud of my work in Season 2, but we were shadowed by this weird audience reaction, this snark. But ultimately we were brought back because there’s this large audience that was so upset that we were gone.”

Baffling, perhaps, but AMC and Sud got the message and have made it clear: This season of “The Killing” will deal with one case and have a definite conclusion when the 12 episodes are over.

“What happened was absolutely a learning experience for me as a storyteller, and sometimes experiences are not easy,” Sud said. “You have to walk through a storm, and at the end of that storm was Linden and Holder. The worst thing that could have happened has already happened. Now I’m just rejoicing in the true pleasure and joy of being back.”
