place the existing contractors excise tax refund program that provided more than $69 million in breaks to dozens of construction projects through its first 15 years. That program is set to expire Jan 1.

"We have a really interesting opportunity, as well as a fairly urgent crisis on our hands," Owen said. "We failed to pass Referred Law 14, and the current law that allows refunds for large projects expires Dec. 31. When the Legislature meets (in January), there is an opportunity to create some kind of incentive program that will have broad political support. They key is, it still has to work in terms of economic development. I think ... the opponents affirmed the importance of economic development. They affirmed we have a problem with some of our tax structure. They believe in the refunds for wind and ethanol. So we need to talk about how we apply this,

words — force and fraud.

"Is someone being made to do something they don't want to do? Are they being tricked into it? Are they being deceived?" he asked. "It's like, 'Come on, I'll give you a ride.' Then you get into the car and you think you're going to get a ride, but then they take you to a field or they take you to a bar."

Human trafficking can be broken down into three categories, Atkinson said. It is done for sex (sex tourism, prostitution, stripping and pornography), forced labor and the selling of body parts (organ trafficking and illegal adoption).

While forced labor is the number one reason for human trafficking worldwide, in the United States, most victims are abducted for sex, Atkinson said. An estimated 100,000 American children are trafficked for sex within the U.S. each year.

"This is the biggest risk for our children," he said.

Atkinson added that with the development of Internet social sites and the increased availability of date rape drugs, targeting victims has become much easier in recent years. "Date rape drugs" are so easy to get nowadays," he said. "It used be this really deep dark secret. And now someone can go online and order it, or get the recipe or figure out how to do it."

Atkinson also stressed that while many people might think human trafficking is a "big city" problem, that's not necessarily the case. He pointed to several South Dakota trafficking cases within the past few years.

"It's business," he said. "If there is a demand in the market for a product, somebody will step forward and provide that product for making a profit."

Atkinson said that many residents from the region are also at risk to become human trafficking victims elsewhere, as many people who find themselves in bad situations will leave the area only to become victims in a larger city. He said he saw a lot of these instances when he worked to combat trafficking in New York City earlier in his career.

"A lot of kids would have problems with alcoholic parents, or women were getting beaten by their alcoholic boyfriends or husbands, and they would run away, and they would go into the streets, and they would go from a small town to the next town, and the next town to a bigger town," Atkinson said.

He said these people followed this "pipeline" until they arrived in a large city, vulnerable with no one to turn to. This made them easy targets for human traffickers.

"You're hungry, you're starving, you're cold, you're sick, you're alone, you're scared," Atkinson said.

what return we are looking for and what kind of projects we want to incentivize."

Rep. Bernie Hunhoff, who was re-elected as the House Minority Leader this past weekend during a meeting of the Legislature's Democrats, was a vocal opponent of the Large Project Development Fund. He attended Monday's event and said he didn't disagree with Owen's reading of the situation.

Owen said the state Chamber has its own ideas on how to proceed and is in talks with legislators.

"I think there will be many ideas that show up (during the legislative session)," he stated. "They may not come in pre-written bills, but I'll guarantee you that, by the end of the second week, we'll have a handful of good concepts that are being sent to some committee. I won't be surprised if the final answer isn't to stay on an easier-to-administer kind of refund program so we can say, 'Here's what the program paid in taxes. Here's what they got back as a partial refund. Here's what it did for jobs, the tax base and quality of life."

Looking ahead to other issues that will likely come up in the next legislative session, Owen said adjustments are likely to workers' compensation and unemployment insurance.

Also, gun rights, road funding and health insurance are topics will probably surface.

Despite the number of states that have passed texting and driving bans, Owen predicted it is unlikely that South Dakota will join them next year.

"Other states have demonstrated that people go from texting above the dashboard to below it. It counters the effect," he said. "It's an urban issue, I think, more than a rural issue. Sioux Falls has proven a city can do that if they want, and I will be surprised if the Legislature does something statewide. As part of that process, I think you'll see a number of cities follow Sioux Falls."

"And someone comes up to you and says, 'Hey can I buy you a burger? You're a nice-looking girl, a nice-looking boy. Do you need a place to stay?'"

To help prevent such human trafficking situations, as well as others, one must first become informed, Atkinson said.

"You have to first understand it yourself," he said. "Be aware of the problem."

Human trafficking information can be found at ITEMP's website at www.ITEMP.org.

Next, Atkinson said the most important action is communication. He advised parents to talk to their children about the dangers of becoming a human trafficking victim.

"The entire success of human trafficking is keeping it secret," he said. "It's a multi-billion-dollar industry based on secrets."

Atkinson also recommended taking computers out of children's bedrooms. "You wouldn't go in a shopping mall in Sioux Falls and bring home a strange man and put them in a bedroom with your daughter," he said. "Why would you do it digitally over the Internet?"

As for people who believe they are in a bad situation at home, Atkinson pleaded to them to speak out.

"If you're in an alcoholic household, if you're a victim of physical abuse or sexual abuse ... get help," he said. "Talk to somebody so that the problem can be resolved."

Atkinson also encouraged everyone to voice their concern if they see any situation that could lead to human trafficking, whether it is an abusive home or a drink that is drugged, regardless if the circumstances are uncomfortable.

"We will never be completely ready. We will never be in the perfect situation," he said. "Do it because it's the right thing to do."
