Co-Host Of NPR's 'Car Talk' Dies

At 77

BY PHILIP MARCELO Associated Press

BOSTON — Tom Magliozzi, one half of the brother duo who hosted National Public Radio's "Car Talk," where they bantered with callers and commiserated over their car problems, died Mon-day of complications day of complications from Alzheimer's disease, the news organization said. He was 77. "Car Talk" was NPR's most popular entertain-ment program for years, reaching more than 4 million people a week on more than 600 radio stations across the country.

It continued to be a top-rated show even after the brothers stopped tap-ing live shows in 2012, and the network began airing repurposed and archived materials.

Car Talk Executive Producer Doug Berman, in a statement posted on NPR's website, said Magliozzi's "dominant, positive personality" will

"He and his brother changed public broad-casting forever," he said. "Before Car Talk, NPR was formal, polite, cautious...even stiff."

The duo, which called themselves "Click and Clack, the Tappet Brothers," dispensed humor and advice about repairing cars. They ended ing cars. They ended their shows with a catch-phrase — "Don't drive like my brother" — deliv-ered in their signature Boston accents.

In a statement posted on Car Talk's website, Ray Magliozzi affectionately teased his late brother, who was 12 years his senior: "Turns out he wasn't kidding...He really could-n't remember last week's puzzler.

The Magliozzis were an unlikely radio duo. The Cambridge, Mas-sachusetts, mechanics and Massachusetts Institute of Technology graduates began their show on WBUR, Boston's NPR affiliate, in 1977 as volu teers. The weekly program became nationally broadcast starting in 1987 after building a steady local following. Magliozzi was born June 28, 1937, in a largely Italian-American section of East Cambridge. According to NPR, he was the first in his family to attend college, earning a chemical engineering degree from MIT.

Magliozzi is survived by his first and second wives, three children, five grandchildren, and his close companion of recent years, Sylvia Soder-berg, NPR said in a statement. In lieu of flowers, the family has requested fans make a donation in his memory to either their local NPŘ station or the Alzheimer's Association.

Worn-Out Hinges Can Make A Car Think The Door Is Open

BY TOM AND RAY MAGLIOZZI King Features Syndicate, Inc.

Dear Tom and Ray:

I have a 1996 Ford Windstar in perfect condition that was driven for years by a little old lady. She actually was from Pasadena, California. The problem is the occasional buzzing. It is like I left a door open while the engine is running. The van will be running fine, with no problems, except the buzzer is buzzing, the interior light is on and a picture of the van is lit up on the dash in red with a door open. Once the van reaches 15 mph, everything goes back to normal — until I slow to under 15 mph, at which point the buzzing starts again. Can you help with this annoyance? I'm going nuts.

RAY: You say the car acts as if a door is open when it's not, Danny.

TOM: Well, it may be that a door actually is

RAY: Not fully open — as in, you make a left turn and you roll out of the car and end up at the curb. But not fully closed, either.

TOM: I feel fortunate in saying that I haven't seen a 1996 Windstar in the shop recently, but there's either a switch in the doorjamb that gets pressed when the door is fully closed, or on some cars the door latch also acts as the switch.

RAY: And unless that switch is fully engaged, closing correctly. That wouldn't be a surprise on a car that's approaching the door isn't the two-decade mark. RAY: If I had to guess, I'd try the driver's door first. Why? Because it's the door that gets opened and closed the most over the life of the vehicle.

TOM: You can try this experiment: Next time the buzzer goes off, roll down the window and get your whole arm on the outside of the door. Then pull the door closed as hard as you can. If you can get the buzzing to stop when you pull, and start again when you release the pressure, you've found the offending door.

RAY: If that experiment doesn't work, you'll have to engage an able-bodied assistant to help you push harder. While the buzzer is sounding. have your assistant stand outside the car and push on the door with both hands.

TOM: If that stops the buzzing, have that assistant run alongside the vehicle for the next few years, pushing on the door, until something more serious breaks.

RAY: Actually, if you get no results on the driver's door, try the driver's-side sliding door next, and then work your way around the vehicle.

TOM: And once you've found it (or even if you can't identify it on your own), a body shop probably is your best bet to have it fixed. Try to get it done before you go completely nuts, Danny. Good

American Life In Poetry

A Flying Light

BY TED KOOSER.

U.S. Poet Laureate

Many poets have attempted to describe the way in which flocks of birds fly, as if they were steered by a single consciousness. In the following poem, David Allan Evans gives us a new metaphor for the way light shows through the flying birds. Evans is Poet Laureate of South Dakota.

SIXTY YEARS LATER I NOTICE, INSIDE A FLOCK OF BLACKBIRDS,

the Venetian blinds I dusted off for my mother on Saturday mornings, closing, opening them with the pull cord a few times just to watch the outside universe keep blinking, as the flock suddenly rises from November stubble, hovers a few seconds, closing, opening, blinking, before it tilts, then vanishes over a hill.
