Climate

The outlook is issued by the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's (NOAA) Climate Prediction Center, she said in a news release.

The most recent forecast continues to indicate El Nino will develop this winter, Edwards said. However, the chance stands at just 60 percent likely, as compared to about 70 percent just a couple of months ago, she said.

"There remains a fair amount of uncertainty," she said. "As a result, in the climate outlook for this coming winter, with a 40 percent chance of remaining in neutral conditions, neither El Nino nor La Nina."

Precipitation outlooks continue to show equal chances of above average, near average and below average precipitation for the coming three months.

"In combination with existing snow cover, this forecast of a cold outbreak would minimize any chance of above-average temperatures for the coming month," Edwards said.

"Even if we reach El Nino conditions, they will be weak and likely would have minimal impact on winter conditions here."

In the short term, the Northern Plains forecast calls for below-normal chances of precipitation during the next two weeks, Today said. "The cold northwest winds don't generally bring precipitation," he said.

ONE FOR THE BOOKS
The prospect of a cooler winter continues the trend of a record-setting cool year so far. From January to October, the Plains remained colder than average, Today said. The colder temperatures were created by high pressure over the nation's mid-section.

The cool trend was then thrown into reverse when South Dakota and Nebraska recorded some of the warmest Octobers in 120 years of records, Today said. In addition, the Northern Plains saw some of the driest Octobers on record. The last 90 days were drier than average for South Dakota and Nebraska.

The warm, dry October helped the harvest - particularly corn - catch up on heat units, Today said.

"For a lot of the corn this year, we had a very good growing season," he said. "However, there was a lack of really hot temperatures, so the corn was slow to develop. The additional heat and dryness (in October) helped to mature more of the corn as farmers harvested it."

Now, the weather has undergone another lurch, Today said. The region is seeing one of its coldest starts to November, similar to the years 1985 and 2000, he said. A number of climatologists have said the current temperatures and snowfall are more on par for January than November.

"The cold of the last couple of weeks is driving a big part of the issue right now," Today said. "We have a very big shift from what we saw over much of the fall, where we saw warmer than average conditions."

The sustained cold, particularly after record warmth in October, makes the current weather shift so noteworthy, Today said.

"Through the central part of the country, we have been 9 to 12 and even 15 degrees below average," he said. "Fifteen to 20 degrees below average isn't that unheard of, but to have two weeks of it is rather astounding."

The National Weather Service office in Sioux Falls noted the fourth longest period of consecutive hours below freezing for November, Today said. "Being below freezing isn't that unusual, but that many (consecutive) hours in November is a bit surprising," he added.

LET IT SNOW
The November cold has been accompanied by the past week's snowfall, Today said. The Upper Midwest has recorded snowpack of up to 20 inches.

"If we're not able to melt this off, we could have the start of a decent snowpack depending on the rest of the winter," he said.

Areas along the Missouri River are seeing a bit of the lake effect snow, but nothing like Buffalo, New York, with its 72 inches since Tuesday, Today said.

Some Midwest farmers are harvesting on top of snow, he said. Some areas in Minnesota and the eastern Dakotas have frozen soil.

"Anecdotally, I have heard from producers who haven't been able to get their crops out of the field," he said. "Instead of paying for drying costs or storage, they are leaving the crops in the field and taking their chances with it."

In the Dakotas and Minnesota, some low-lying areas saw freezing even where temperatures remained in the mid 30s, he said.

The quick weather change also created stress for livestock which hadn't developed winter coats or were forced to move out of cornfields, he added.

During Thursday's call, one U.S. Army Corps of Engineers official said the Corps was watching ice accumulation in and along the Missouri River. While not a major problem right now, the Corps is watching for the possible formation of ice jams.

Today noted the current snow could help fill Missouri River reservoirs next spring.

The areas which are currently dry will likely remain that way for the next three months, Edwards said.

"The months of December through February are generally the driest of the year, so the current areas of drought are expected to remain through the next few months," she said.

Orders

seriously exploring options for unilateral action.

Still, that process has been beset by delays, especially Obama's decision to hold off on announcing the executive orders until after the midterms. Some Democrats had feared that thrusting the immigration debate to the forefront of the campaign would hurt their chances of keeping control of the Senate, though the White House's delay ultimately did little to stem their defeats.

While Obama's measures are sweeping in scope, they still leave more than half of the 11 million people living in the U.S. illegally in limbo. The president announced new deportation priorities that would compel law enforcement to focus its efforts on tracking down serious criminals and people who have recently crossed the border, while specifically placing a low priority on those who have been in the U.S. for more than 10 years.

He insisted that his actions did not amount to amnesty.

The main beneficiaries of the president's actions are immigrants who have been in the U.S. illegally for more than five years but whose children are citizens or lawful permanent residents. After passing background checks and paying fees, those individuals can now be granted relief from deportation for three years and get work permits. The administration expects about 4.1 million people to qualify.

Obama is also broadening his 2012 directive that deferred deportation for some young immigrants who entered the country illegally.

Obama will expand eligibility to people who arrived in the U.S. as minors before 2010, instead of the current cutoff of 2007, and will lift the requirement that applicants be under 31. The expansion is expected to affect about 300,000 people.

Applications for the new deportation deferrals will begin in the spring. Those who qualify would be granted deportation deferrals for three years.

The White House insists Obama has the legal authority to halt deportations for parents and for people who came to the U.S. as children, primarily on humanitarian grounds. Officials also cited precedents set by previous immigration executive actions by Democratic and Republican presidents dating back to Dwight Eisenhower.

A senior administration official said the decision to protect parents of citizens or lawful permanent residents is in line with an existing law that allows adult citizens to sponsor their parents for immigration. Obama's plan goes a step further because the sponsoring citizen doesn't have to be an adult.

GOP lawmakers disagree with Obama's claims of legal authority, calling his actions an unconstitutional power grab.

Republicans are weighing a range of responses, including filing legal challenges and using must-pass spending legislation this fall to try to stop Obama's effort. One lawmaker — Republican Rep. Mo Brooks of Alabama — has raised the specter of impeachment.

GOP leaders have warned against such talk and are seeking to avoid spending-bill tactics that could lead to a government shutdown. They say such moves could backfire, angering many voters and alienating Hispanics for the next presidential election.
