their handlers. The footage is then given to law enforcement so they are able to conduct raids on the brothels and take the underage girls out of there.

"I never dreamed that ordinary people like myself could participate in the freedom of someone else," Zach said. "In the words of Bono (of U2), we can tear a little corner off the darkness."

Kevin Koliner, a federal prosecutor of the U.S. attorney general office of South Dakota, knows all too well some of that darkness can be found here in the state.

Koliner was first introduced to local human trafficking several years ago when a man was arrested in Tea for threatening underage victims who had spoken to the police. The man eventually received a life sentence in prison, making Koliner confident that human trafficking would no longer be a state issue.

Unfortunately, he was wrong.

"We have convicted over 40 men in South Dakota for sex trafficking offenses," said Koliner. "We have prosecuted more customers trying to buy sex acts with children than any other state in the country combined. We lead the nation in these cases."

Koliner credits the state victim-centered approach policy and the state law enforcement for working together as a reason for their success.

"When we have a young girl who is arrested or encountered in some type of prostitution act, we look at her as a potential victim first," he explained. "Ten years ago, some young women in that position would be seen as a criminal. That's a paradigm shift in law enforcement."

Koliner emphasized that the cases couldn't be solved without the participation of the victims.

"Time and time again we have these brave young women who walk into these bright court rooms and talk about the most embarrassing things you can imagine to a bunch of strangers," Koliner said. "They do it because they want to see justice be served. It's a wonderful thing to see."

Lisa Heth and Kimberly LaPlante detailed their work with their individual organizations.

Heth is a member of Wiconi Wawokiyi, Inc., based in Fort Thompson, an organization that specializes in helping victims of domestic and sexual violence. She detailed how the Pathfinder Center located in central South Dakota was created as a safe haven to help human trafficking victims rebuild their lives.

Originally a hotel, the center is used for helping victims feel they are in a home-type environment in which to recuperate.

"Our goal is to help them find their talents and gifts that are buried within them," Heth explained.

Other groups and organizations can sponsor a room in the center to help it look less like a hotel space.

"It's a way of saying the state cares about them and shows it through these rooms," said Heth. "It's a way for them to feel safe."

LaPlante works with a similar organization called Tapestry International Ministry based in Sioux Falls.

She said human trafficking occurs in three ways: 1) "homegrown," or through a family or friends system due to poverty or other reasons; 2) transience, where victims will be moved from place to place to be kept disoriented or to be kept "fresh" for new buyers; and 3) event trafficking where buyers attend large events like the Sturgis Motorcycle Rally with the intention of having sex with underage girls.

The ministry works to rehabilitate trafficking victims to everyday life.

"We offer case management, help them find jobs, get into school and offer trauma care," LaPlante elaborated. "Some are victims of trafficking through their own families. We become their support system or help them find a new one."

Creating a safe haven for victims is a key step to helping them heal.

"Safety is a key ingredient to reaching the most vulnerable," said LaPlante. "We need to create spaces for all these touchy issues and be real with each other."
