Assess Security Before Syrian Settlement

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Gov. Pete Ricketts says he does not want Syrian refugees resettling in Nebraska until the federal government conducts a full review of its screening procedures to ensure public safety.

Ricketts sent a letter Monday to refugee resettlement agencies in the state, urging them not to pursue resettlement of the refugees in light of the terrorist attacks in Paris.

Several U.S. governors have made similar statements amid heightened concerns that terrorists might use the refugees as cover to sneak across borders.

Ricketts says in the letter that while he understands the danger and persecution many are facing in the Middle East, it's important to focus first on the safety of Nebraska residents and Americans.

Ricketts says he's been told no Syrian refugees have been resettled in Nebraska.

SD Universities Mull Booze Sales At Campus Events

BY EMILY NIEBRUGGE
Rapid City Journal

RAPID CITY — Like an inexperienced college student unsure about taking that first offered beer at a party, the state's university system is facing a difficult decision about alcohol.

Should it be sold on campuses? The proposal is coming before the state Board of Regents in December, and it has been a topic discussed by the university system's council of presidents and superintendents, then handed to a task force comprising representatives of the six state universities.

The South Dakota Legislature would have to pass a law allowing such sales.

A central concern: Although selling alcohol on university campuses has the potential to increase revenues for campus activities and scholarships, would the availability of alcohol exacerbate the societal problem of binge drinking among the young?

But the head of the task force studying the proposal told the Rapid City Journal recently that the discussion thus far has been about the serving of alcohol in limited, controlled situations.

"I don't think anyone should assume there should be pubs on campus," said Janelle Toman, the Board of Regents director of communications and chairwoman of the task force. "That's not where task force was going at all. No one (at the task force meeting) spoke about it being generally available on campus, nor do I think that's the direction we would go."

Rather, Toman said, the focus has been more about alcohol sales at events and specific locations such as event centers and stadiums.

The task force, which met last week, is in the fact-finding phase of its work, Toman said.

Members are curious about how campus alcohol sales are handled in other states, what those states' laws say, and what the potential law changes and potential policy changes are, she said.

State law has banned alcohol sales on campuses since at least 1939. The law says no on-sale or off-sale license may be granted to operate on the campus of any state educational institution.

The law defines "campus" as the area immediately surrounding the buildings used for classrooms, administrative offices, athletic facilities and housing.

Representatives of each of the six South Dakota regents schools have been asked to compile information in such areas as the amount of revenues that could result from such sales, what licensing would entail, and where the alcohol would be offered.

Heather Wilson, president of the South Dakota School of Mines and Technology, said she has concerns about the proposal.

"While I would be naive if I said (drinking) didn't exist, it's a caution for me," Wilson said. "As a president, we try to encourage students to make responsible and healthy decisions. We don't want to send mixed messages about that."

"At the same time, consumption by adults is legal, and our students are at the point where they're becoming adults.

Lincoln Puts Pressure On Owners Of Problem Properties

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Lincoln's neglected building registry is putting financial pressure on homeowners to fix or demolish the city's most problematic properties.

Under the new rules, owners of neglected property have 30 days to register and pay $500. After 90 days, the owner must register again and pay $500 for another three months. If owners do not voluntarily register, the city will file paperwork for them, charging the $500 fee and a $500 penalty.

The Lincoln Journal Star reports the city placed 28 properties on the registry in the past year. Eighteen of those properties were declared neglected after city inspectors fielded complaints, and 10 properties were declared neglected after they had been condemned as unlivable for two years or more.

Jon Carlson, a mayoral aide in charge of the city's Stronger Safer Neighborhoods initiative, says "It's not a gigantic number in the community, but if you happen to live next door, or you're a Realtor trying to list a house across the street, it's a big deal. It impacts quality of life."

Assistant City Attorney Chris Connolly wrote the registry ordinance after reviewing how six other cities handle neglected properties. Connolly says that he would not call the ordinance an unqualified success, but he is encouraged by the progress made thus far.

"We're making these people commit to something. Up to this point, they haven't committed to anything," Connolly said.

The City Council is expected to place liens against eight properties that have been on the registry the longest, and have amassed fines and fees ranging from $1,000 to $3,000. The liens will give the city the ability to prompt a sheriff's sale so a new owner can give the property more attention. The city may be able to recover its money or waive the liens for the new owner.

The registry has a two-year limit so that an owner can end up with $8,000 on fees and fines, but cannot continue to try and buy time from the city. After two years, the city can possibly seek criminal charges against a property owner or a court order to have the property razed or repaired.

"We're using appropriate tools, but when people don't respond, we can increase our tools and increase our activity," Carlson said.
