

Living... A Passion for Christmas

Imagine if you will a scenario which an individual is driving their car down the quiet road of Pine Street in Yankton, South Dakota with thoughts of reuniting with their family after a long and stressful day at work. The wintery evening is dark, yet calm as the snow is gracefully making its long journey from December clouds to the frozen ground below. His mind is filled with memories and thoughts concerning events that had happened throughout the day when suddenly he notices something peculiar out of the corner of his eye. He parks his car on the side of the road to take a closer look and notices a stone path winding its way to a house. This house is small by the looks of it, but uniquely shaped. But even more peculiar is the radiant glow bursting from the windows, and immediately this man realizes that this house is quite far from ordinary. Because beyond the glow from within these windows rests a world where Christmas is a little more than just a simple holiday that comes but once a year. It is a welcomed guest.

This is the house of Jeannette Warren, a Yankton resident since 1958, and her love for Christmas surpasses most other individuals who live on her block (if not the entire Yankton
