Harvest

"The corn was first for a lot of guys (before beans), which was odd. We were already seeing corn in mid-September," he said. "We're now in the first week of October, and we are pretty much done with corn when we would first be doing beans."

Cutts used a personal reminder to illustrate the strange harvest season.

"My wife's birthday is the 26th of September, and the usual question of whether we celebrate (her birthday) is whether the farmers are combining beans or not (and if I'm too busy)," he said. "But this year, they were taking corn out of the fields by the second week of September."

Yankton County's rapid harvest falls in line with the rest of the state.

According to South Dakota's weekly state crop report, 55 percent of the state's corn for grain has been harvested, up from 36 percent the previous week and well ahead of the five-year average of 6 percent.

Soybeans harvested statewide were at 79 percent, up from 47 percent the previous year and well ahead of the five-year average of 16 percent.

The Nebraska weekly state crop report also lists harvest nearing completion in the northeast part of the Husker State.

Drought has definitely taken its toll on this year's harvest, but stellar yields remain in certain places, Cutts said.

"As far as corn, the yields are all over the board. They go from zero to the 100-bushel range. The best yields were coming from the bottom land by Gayville," he said. "The yields all depend on location and also on hybrids. I would say, overall, we're looking at 25 percent of normal."

Farmers have attacked their cornfields in two stages, Kosters said.

"The outer rows usually became silage because they received the most heat and direct sunlight," he said. "But then, the farmers ran into corn that made decent yields, and those rows were harvested."

Many fields weren't producing much yield, so the decision to create silage made good financial sense, Cutts said.

"The feedlots bought a lot of silage. In Nebraska, they are short on feed," he said. "The hay market is crazy, especially for horses. Hay that used to cost $100 a ton is now costing $300 a ton."

The beans are looking good, but some yields are running as low as 10 bushels an acre, Cutts said.

Beans began arriving at the Mission Hill elevator one to two weeks ago, Kosters said. "As of a week ago, we had almost one bin full of beans," he said.

The quality of beans has been hit and miss, Kosters said.

"The beans are pretty dry and small," he said. "The farmers don't think they have much of a crop because the beans are shriveled. Then, 24 hours later, the beans pop up."

The drought-stricken harvest scene actually contains some silver linings, Cutts said.

"We haven't worried about drying down the harvest and having that expense," he said. "There was some earlier corn that had planting issues and was at 18 or 19 percent (moisture content). But for the most part, we have loads coming in at 10 to 15 percent moisture."

The harvest season has been good for the elevator's fuel bills, Kosters said.

"As far as using our dryer, we haven't had to do that much at all. We just put it in the bin and let the fans do it naturally, blowing everything," he said. "We don't have the drying costs, which really helps because propane isn't cheap."

This year's harvest has also remained mostly pest free, Kosters said.

"We haven't seen much for grasshoppers this year," he said.

"Around the first of September, they popped out and then they disappeared."

The slowdown of elevator traffic, while created this year by drought, has been seen more often in recent years, Cutts said.

"We have fewer farmers and bigger semis, so you don't have as many loads going back and forth," he said.

Kosters uses the down time to take care of maintenance, grind corn and make feed.

As for the harvest itself, the beans generally go to Sioux City. The corn mostly ends up at seven regional ethanol plants, many of them within 50 miles of Mission Hill.

Despite the drought, farmers have generally allowed for set-backs and are able to meet their grain contracts, Cutts said.

The Mission Hill elevator provides storage for area farmers, Cutts said. The purchase of two larger bins in recent years has boosted the elevator's storage capacity, he said.

"We had two bins that were blown over because of a storm two years ago. We previously had two 50,000-bushel bins, and now we replaced them with two 125,000-bushel bins," he said.

"The new bins were a good investment. It has modernized things and has sped up the way we can handle business at the elevator. We may have had a drought this year, but you have to look at things in the long term."

Cutts wants to turn the page on this year's drought.

"They took (aerial) pictures of my farm in August, and it was all brown," he said. "I don't want to remember that (image)."

A farmer himself, Cutts looks forward to better times.

"Farmers are the eternal optimists," he said. "As they say, there's always next year."

tions and culture of the state's Native American inhabitants. Each year, South Dakota schools, communities and organizations present a variety of activities to help educate the people of the state about the Lakota, Dakota and Nakota people.

While MMC's presentation Thursday will be the first time the school has hosted this type of an event for the holiday, it won't be the college's first celebration dedicated to Native American history, Kahle said.

"Traditionally, in the past, there used to be pow-wows held on campus," he said. "They're difficult to organize, but it's something I'd like to see happen again."

Kahle said celebrations such as musical presentations and pow-wows are important because they help spread awareness about cultures that many people don't fully understand.

"In the history books, all too often what we find is a negative portrayal of tragedy," he said. "But there's also the other side of the coin, which shows a brilliant way of life."

Kahle said he expects a good turnout for Thursday's presentation and believes the audience will be treated to a "very uplifting" experience.

"I would recommend it to anybody that is looking for a unique phonic expression of spiritual harmonies through voice and song and instruments," he said. "I encourage everybody to come and broaden their sense of appreciation."
