'Sunny' Still Keeps Its Fresh And Funny

BY ELLEN GRAY

LA CANADA FLINTRIDGE, Calif. — The forecast for July 31 called for "mostly" sunny, but as the cast and crew of "It's Always Sunny in Philadelphia" began a day of shooting on Season 8, above at least one neighborhood in this small, affluent city north of Los Angeles the sky was a clear, uncompromising blue.

And on the ground below, there was trash piled everywhere. Inside a brown van parked in the driveway of a home that could double for a Chestnut Hill mansion, "Sunny" stars Rob McEl-henney, Danny DeVito, Kaitlin Olson, Glenn Howerton and Charlie Day filmed a scene as crew members rocked the van from outside.

Down the street, a turquoise trash truck awaited its close-up. And the attention of one wellconnected toddler.

"Axel's obsessed with trash trucks," explained McElhenney of his and Olson's oldest son, who turned 2 on Sept. 1. (His brother, Leo, was born April 5.)

And so his father came up with an episode about a Philly garbage strike so Axel could see a trash truck?

"Specifically so we could have a trash truck on set and he could spend at least three or four hours with it," said McElhenney, who created the show about friends who run a bar in South Philly. He and fellow executive producers Day and Howerton continue to write for it.

"When he gets here, you'll see his reaction to this trash truck. It's going to blow his mind."

In the meantime, it's back to the van for McElhenney, where Day has spent part of the morning hurtling out the rear doors, on each take jumping or falling a little differently as the crew adjusted pads below, trying to keep them out of the shot while protecting the actor.

"Hopefully, I don't break my rib, the way I did in Season 4," said Day, referring to the "A Very Sunny Christmas" special, where "they were blowing fake snow on us — it was hard to actually see — and I jumped as I high as I could ... backwards and I curled up in a ball and I missed the pad and just landed on the floor. And cracked a rib."

"Charlie, just so you know, this is the softer part," said a crew member, pointing to a section of the pad.

So he's a little more careful these days?

He laughed. "Yeah, I want to at least make sure I land on the pad," he said, adding that he does something risky and stupid every season. And the older I get, the more stupid it seems."

Willful stupidity remains at the hilarious heart of "It's Always Sunny," which returns Thursday with "Pop-Pop: The Final Solution," an episode about Dee (Olson) and Dennis (Howerton) and their dying, Nazi grandfather that demonstrates once again that its characters, as McElhenney likes to put it, are "never learning anything or growing or changing."

But there's nothing stupid, or haphazard, about the making of the show, which is shot more efficiently than most, with five of the season's 10 episodes in production at a time.

When McElhenney decided, for Season 7, that his character, Mac, should gain 50 pounds — to buck the sitcom convention that TV characters, unlike the rest of us, tend to get more attractive over time — he didn't settle for a fat suit. But he did consult a nutritionist to pack on the pounds as healthily as possible.

Most of the extra weight's now gone, but McElhenney's no less conscious of the need to differentiate "Sunny" from other long-running comedies.

There's more at work in "The Gang Recycles Their Trash," the episode for which the "Sunny" crew had temporarily trashed a lovely neighborhood, than a treat for his son.

"We come into the first scene and we're talking about a plan to make money that sounds very (familiar) to us and we realize it's something we've already done, it's something we've already tried," McElhenney said.

"And we realize that's very common in the eighth season of a
