

TV's Minority Report Just Not Making The Grade

MINNEAPOLIS — Last time you went to a clinic, chances were good that your primary doctor was of South Asian descent — unless you happened to check into a TV hospital.

Fox's "The Mindy Project," a new sitcom about a lovesick ob/gyn, is the first series on broadcast television to feature an Indian-American in the lead role, a milestone that writer/star Mindy Kaling does her best to downplay.

"There's a saying that I really believe in when it comes to my 'Indianness,'" said "The Office" veteran. "I try not to rely on it nor deny it."

What Kaling and the rest of Hollywood can't deny is that the industry has made little progress in putting minority actors in leading roles.

While there's a steady stream of great minority character actors playing diner owners, community-college students and even physicists, they rarely get to be the star. The only returning broadcast shows with that distinction are ABC's "Scandal," featuring Kerry Washington, and CW's low-rated "Nikita," with Maggie Q.

That lack of diversity was glaring at TV's Emmy Awards two weeks ago. Of the 25 performers nominated for leading roles in a drama or comedy, only one was a minority actor: Don Cheadle, for "House of Lies."

Lance Reddick, a supporting player on Fox's "Fringe," said he isn't optimistic about the future, especially after his experience as a cast member of "The Wire." That HBO series is now considered a masterpiece, but during its 2002-08 run it failed to attract a significant audience or a single Emmy nomination for its largely black cast.

"I'm not holding my breath for acknowledgment of African-American talent," he said.

Reddick and many of his peers thought the landscape would change when Andre Braugher took home a leading-actor Emmy in 1998 for his work on "Homicide: Life on the Street," becoming only the third black actor to win in that category (Bill Cosby and James Earl Jones got there first). But in the 14 years since, it's seen only one minority nominee: Braugher again, for the swiftly canceled medical drama "Gideon's Crossing."

It's even worse for women. No actress of color ever has won for a dramatic lead role. And the last nomination? Way back in 1994, when Cicely Tyson got one for the short-lived drama "Sweet Justice."

As for comedy, only two people of color have been nominated for lead roles in the past 20 years:

Tony Shalhoub, who won three times for "Monk," and America Ferrera, a winner for "Ugly Betty"

his new ABC series, "Last Resort," in which he stars as a U.S. submarine captain who turns renegade after his government endows him after his government orders him to nuke Pakistan. Braugher, who won a second Emmy in 2007 for the miniseries "Thief," hopes his success is making a difference, but it's hard for him to gauge.

"The only thing I can suggest is that the wins weren't a blip, that it's part of a progression, but it runs at its own pace and I don't have control or the solution," he said.

Lack of control may be an understatement. Only one non-white has ever run a major network's has ever run a major network's entertainment division: Scott Sassa, an Asian-American executive who helmed NBC's programming in 1998-99.

It's no coincidence that three of TV's most diverse series — "Grey's Anatomy," "Scandal" and "Private Practice" — are run by a black woman, Shonda Rhimes.

Why is the industry falling short? David Simon, who created "The Wire" and "Treme" for HBO, compares the situation to the urban phenomenon of "white flight."

"A black sidekick here and there, no problem," he said. "A couple less-than-central characters in an ensemble piece, OK. It makes us all feel better about ourselves. Anything beyond that and 'There goes the neighborhood.'"
