well," he said. "They are extremely demanding on our guys — they're worn out, they're tired, mentally shot, physically shot."

He added while the goal is to never need the training, it's safer to be prepared for dangerous situations.

"Hopefully we never have to use this training that we're getting," he said. "But in the unfortunate event that this should happen, they will be ready."

Obama Signs Bill To Pay Military Death Benefits

BY DONNA CASSATA AND DARLENE SUPERVILLE
 Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Families of fallen troops will be assured of receiving death benefits under legislation President Barack Obama signed Thursday amid a national firestorm after the Pentagon suspended the roughly $100,000 payments during the partial government shutdown.

Obama signed the bill into law after it won final passage in the Senate earlier in the day.

But his chief spokesman, Jay Carney, had said the measure was unnecessary because a military charity had stepped in to continue the payments. Carney also had declined to say whether Obama would sign the bill, which reinstates benefits for surviving family members, including funeral and burial expenses, and death gratuity payments.

The Pentagon typically pays out $100,000 within three days of a service member's death. It said 29 active-duty service members have died since Oct. 1, when parts of the government shut down in a dispute between the White House and Congress over the president's health care law.

The Pentagon had said the lapse in funding meant it had no authority to continue the payments, but that explanation that did not sit well with members of Congress in either party. The Pentagon said a law allowing members of the military to be paid during the shutdown did not cover the death benefit payments. Congress passed and Obama signed that measure into law before the shutdown began, and lawmakers insisted the benefits shouldn't have been affected.

In stepped the Fisher House Foundation, which Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel said Wednesday would cover the costs during the shutdown. Hagel said the Pentagon would reimburse the foundation after the shutdown ends. The government could not actively solicit funds from private organizations but could accept an offer.

The administration said Thursday night that the Pentagon's agreement with Fisher House would remain intact to make sure the benefits are delivered without further interruption until officials can get the program up and running again.

The bill is the second "piecemeal" measure Obama has signed to hold the military harmless during the shutdown. At the same time, the White House has threatened veto of other "piecemeal" measures passed by the Republican-controlled House to continue funding for certain government operations. The White House has said the House should reopen the entire government and not choose to fund some agencies and programs over others.

Obama also supports House-passed legislation to provide back pay for thousands of federal workers forced off the job because of the shutdown.

Across the Capitol, Republicans on a House Armed Services panel excoriated Pentagon comptroller Robert Hale, accusing him of playing politics with his interpretation of the original law. They said the law was designed to pay the death benefits as well as keep all Defense Department civilians on the job — not to select the most essential.

"You went out of your way to make this as ugly as possible, to inflict as much pain as possible on this department," said Rep. Mike Coffman, R-Colo., who introduced the first bill days before the shutdown in an attempt to exempt the military.

Hale responded that the law was poorly written and there never should have been a shutdown in the first place.

"I resent your remarks," the budget chief said. "I acted on the advice of attorneys and our best reading of a loosely worded law."

U.N. Extends NATO Force In Afghanistan

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Thursday to extend the mandate of the NATO-led force in Afghanistan for the last time before it hands over total responsibility for security to Afghan forces at the end of 2014.

The resolution adopted by the council said the situation in Afghanistan "still constitutes a threat to international peace and security."

It expressed serious concern about security in the country, pointing to ongoing violence and terrorist activities by the Taliban, al-Qaida, and other illegal and extremist groups as well as by criminals and those involved in the illegal drug trade.

The Taliban have escalated attacks in recent months as they try to take advantage of the withdrawal of foreign troops. In June, Afghan forces took the lead for security nationwide, leaving the NATO-led International Assistance Force known as ISAF entirely in a supporting, backseat role.

ISAF has dropped dramatically in strength as it prepares to leave — down from 130,000 troops two years to just over 87,200 troops on Aug. 1, including 60,000 Americans.

The Security Council extended ISAF's mandate until Dec. 31, 2014, the final day for transferring full security responsibility to the Afghan government.

Its action followed an outburst Monday from Afghan President Hamid Karzai who alleged that the U.S. and NATO inflicted suffering on the Afghan people and repeatedly violated its sovereignty. Despite his critical remarks, the Obama administration is still optimistic that a U.S.-Afghan agreement over the future role of American troops in the country can be finalized in the next few weeks.

Karzai made the comments on the 12th anniversary of the start of the American campaign in Afghanistan against al-Qaida that ousted its Taliban allies from power.

coordinated workers, machinery, food and fuel.

The effort brought together, by one estimate, 14 combines, seven grain carts and about 15 to 20 trucks. One organizer said the Irene elevator was giving preferential treatment to the Halvorson harvesting bee so the effort could flow uninterrupted.

Using a lift, the Halvorson family, friends and media could witness the whirring activity from about 50 feet in the air. They marveled at the wide expanse of continual effort all around them.

"It's just incredible. It's awesome," Nancy Halvorson said.

When it came to planning, organizers also took into account the unpredictable autumn weather. Based on weather conditions and the forecast, they opted for Thursday with its sunshine and high temperature around 80 degrees.

Of course, that also meant the participants were giving up a perfect day for their own harvest activities. And the harvest has become a race against the clock, with the forecast calling for the possibility of wind and rain in the coming days.

Still, the volunteers said they wouldn't have it any other way. Denny Halvorson was always there for them, and now they needed to be there for the Halvorsons in their time of need.

The tight bond during Thursday's fieldwork continued at the lunch held afterwards. The workers shared not only food but also stories about their departed friend and the day's successful harvest.

Family, friends and neighbors are already planning for the Halvorson corn harvest, likely in a couple of weeks. That undertaking may need

Hunting

Service workers are protecting more than 150 million acres of wildlife refuges — an area nearly twice as large as the national park system.

Wildlife-related recreation is a big business in the U.S., with more than 90 million Americans spending more than $144 billion in 2011, according to the Fish and Wildlife Service.

In Minnesota, which celebrates its pheasant opener this weekend, the Fish and Wildlife Service has closed 13 national wildlife refuges, eight wetland management districts, one ecological services office and the Midwest regional office, totaling more than 489,000 acres.

More than a half-million residents and visitors hunt in Minnesota each year, contributing an estimated $725 million to the state's economy, according to the Minnesota Department of Natural Resources. Statewide, more than 80,000 hunters are expected to go after pheasants this year. Fish and Wildlife spokesman Tim Patronski said the skeleton crew of federal wildlife officers won't be able to cover up the numerous green-and-white waterfowl production area signs that state, "Open to public hunting." Officers will talk to anyone they encounter, he said.

"Our primary role is to educate, just to get the word out," Patronski said.

Steve Williams, former director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, said public lands available for hunting already are too crowded, and the federal acres closure will further deter hunters from trying to find their spots. Williams, president of the Wildlife Management Institute, said most hunters want to hunt legally, and the confusion over what's open and what's closed will likely prompt some people to just stay home.

"I'm sure there'll be some number that will say, 'I don't know where to go, where I'm allowed to go and therefore I'm not going to take a chance,'" said Williams. "And perhaps they won't go at all."

The shutdown comes just as most states' primary hunting seasons get underway.

"For guides it's like Macy's at Christmas, you lose your income for the year," said Desiree Sorenson-Groves, vice president of the National Wildlife Refuge Association, an advocacy group.

Tags to hunt bears at Alaska's Kodiak Island National Wildlife Refuge are tough to get, and the closure is forcing eager hunters to alter their plans for hunts that should have kicked off Oct. 1, said Land Tawney, executive director of Missoula, Mont.-based Backcountry Hunters and Anglers.

That hurts not only hunters, but the businesses they support, he said.

Tawney said he scouted an area of the Ninepipe National Wildlife Refuge for two weeks with hopes of duck hunting but had to take his shotgun to another part of Montana.

"It's a duck haven, and this time of year it's a great place to duck hunt," he said.

In some parts of the country, hunters have waited 15 to 20 years to earn a tag to hunt big game such big horned elk or pronghorn antelope.

"Now they have to turn in their tags and wait another year," said Gaspar Perricone, co-director of Bull Moose Sportsmen's Alliance, a Colorado-based hunting group.
