others who say, 'Good luck; it's not our battle,'" Erickson said. South Dakota Lottery Executive Director Norm Lingle said the situation is "somewhat complicated," including questions as to where business boundaries start and end. He said his staff is trying to come up with a resolution, though they aren't aiming for a two days before, entered, fired several rounds from a handgun and told everyone to get on the floor. Natalie Robbins was in another writing class nearby in Snyder Hall when she heard the first muffled gunshot that sounded more like a table had been overturned. "We heard this first BOOM," Robbins said. "About 45 seconds later we hear boom, boom, boom, boom, boom. Six shots. In the middle of that is when my instructor said, 'We have to get the hell out of here.'"

She and other classmates bolted out of the room toward the campus center.

The first 911 call was made at 10:38 a.m., but those on campus were not immediately alerted.

Biology professor Ken Carloni was sitting in his office in the science building next door when a colleague entered with a startled groundskeeper who said there was a shooting.

They locked the building, gathered about 40 students from the surrounding classrooms and huddled with them in a small hallway with no outside-facing windows.

Back in Snyder Hall, Lacey Scroggins didn't see her teacher fall, but Anastasia Boylan did.

The first-year student told her family from the hospital that Levine was shot at point-blank range.

"She was crying and saying, 'Grandma, he killed my teacher! He killed my teacher! I saw it!'" Janet Willis said, in recounting her granddaughter's story.

In the chaos that followed, Boylan found herself on the classroom floor, bleeding next to a friend who had also been shot.

Harper-Mercer began singling them out for slaughter, certain timeline.

Lingle said legislators can also "make tweaks to various statutes." Krasky said council members should at the very least more closely scrutinize liquor license requests and consider denying them if state laws are being broken.

"It's frustrating," he said. "It's been one of my deals for the last several years, this situation where we have laws that aren't enforceable, or that aren't enforced. Why do we even bother?"

telling them to stand and state their religion.

Both Boylan and Scroggins said the gunman shot Christians in the head and wounded others, though there was at least one account that said he treated all religions with the same cold response.

"She hears the shooter in front say, 'You, in that orange shirt, stand up!'" Randy Scroggins said. "What religion are you? Are you a Christian?" He says 'Yes.' She hears another pop, and she hears a thud as he drops to the ground."

Rand McGowan, who was shot in the hand, told his mother it didn't seem the shooter was deliberately targeting Christians.

"It was more so saying, 'You're going to be meeting your maker,'" Stephanie Salas said.

Boylan, 18, was in terrible pain when Harper-Mercer told her to stand. She had been shot through the spine and a bullet was lodged in her back.

"Hey blonde girl," he said, according to her grandmother. "Get up! I want to talk to you!"

Like Scroggins, she played dead and Mercer left her there.

He showed little mercy to others.

At one point, Chris Mintz, an Army veteran and student who helped evacuate his classroom nearby, sounded a fire alarm in another building and ran back to help. He was shot as he came through the classroom door.

Mintz asked the gunman to stop, saying it was his son's birthday. The gunman opened fire again, shooting Mintz but somehow missing vital organs. Mintz lived.

The gunman told a woman to beg for her life, Randy Scroggins said. She did and he shot her anyway.

One woman tried to show sympathy for the shooter, saying she was sorry for whatever happened to him.

"He said, 'I bet you are, but it's not enough.' And with that, he shot her," Randy Scroggins said as he began to cry.
