DEATH AND TRANSFORMATION

In her groundbreaking book On Death and Dying, Dr. Elisabeth Kubler-Ross outlines the five distinct stages of grief as denial and isolation, anger, bargaining, depression, and finally acceptance. Although each grieving individual may pass through these stages in different sequences and spend different amounts of time in each stage, most grieving individuals react similarly. There is the initial sense of shock and denial, followed by a longer stage of psychic pain. After the initial shock has worn off and emotions have diminished, the bereaved enters an adjustment phase, in which the absence of the deceased compels a change in routine and action. Eventually, death may come to represent a beginning more than an ending.
