

Flood Cleanup: Prevent Illness And Injury

PIERRE — The South Dakota Department of Health reminds homeowners to reduce the risk of disease and injury from flood cleanup by following these personal precautions:

- Wear hard-soled shoes, long-sleeved shirts, long pants and heavy work gloves.
- Scrub walls, hard-surfaced floors, counter tops, pantry shelves, etc. with warm soapy water, then sanitize with a solution of 1 cup of bleach to 5 gallons of water.
- To clean actual mold growth from hard surfaces such as floors or countertops, wash with a solution of 1 cup bleach to 1 gallon water, rinse with clean water and allow to air dry. Ventilate the area while using any cleaning products.

- Remove and throw away any insulating material that has been saturated with flood waters.
- If there has been sewage backflow into the house, remove and throw out wall coverings, cloth, rugs, sheetrock and other absorbent materials. Wear rubber boots and waterproof gloves during the cleanup. Clean and mop the area, treat with disinfectant and dehumidify.
- Do not use gas- or diesel-powered pumps, generators, or pressure washers inside as they release carbon monoxide, a deadly but colorless and odorless gas. It is virtually impossible to assure adequate ventilation.
- Clean minor wounds thoroughly with soap and water, cover and keep them dry while working on cleanup. If you need a tetanus shot, see your doctor. Wash hands often with soap and water.

- Set priorities for cleanup tasks and pace the work out over days or even weeks. Get plenty of rest and take frequent rest breaks before exhaustion builds up.

While it is always a good idea to make sure immunizations are up to date, there are no special recommendations for tetanus immunizations during flood situations. Adults should have a tetanus booster shot every 10 years.

Warren said the money raised at the event is used as a cushion for expenses that cannot be covered by grants.

"If our victims need something when they come in that the grants can't pay for, that's when this money is utilized," she stated.

Among this year's participants will be members of a coordinated response team created earlier this year to prevent violence against women in the Yankton area. It includes members from law enforcement, health care and social services agencies.

"I'm very pleased with the team, and I think we should be proud of how the community has come together to form it," Warren said. "We have some very devoted members. Other communities in the state have struggled to get a team like this put together. Ours has come together seamlessly, and we are planning some future events."

"Walk A Mile In Her Shoes" gets under way at 4:30 p.m. Saturday, Sept. 17, near the intersection of Third Street and Capital Street in downtown Yankton. Registration begins at 3 p.m., and opening remarks follow at 4 p.m., leading up to the walk.

"I would encourage people to come down and support the walkers," Warren said. "If they can contribute to a walker financially, that would be appreciated."

they consider inadequate pipeline safety and emergency spill responses.

Supporters say the environmental concerns are overblown, and argue that the pipeline will create jobs and reduce the nation's dependence on Middle East oil.

TransCanada spokesman Terry Cunha said the company disagreed with the governor, but was open to any questions he might have about the route. Cunha said moving the route would disrupt even more land, including wetlands and more developed areas. He said the plan has won support from several other state executives, including Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer.

"We believe we're building the safest pipeline in North America," Cunha said. "As we've tried to articulate during the three-year review process, we've been very open and transparent" with more than 90 public hearings in the affected states.

The pipeline also has won support from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which launched a campaign this week to highlight the estimated 20,000 jobs the line would create during the two-year construction period, as well as its potential national security benefits.

Pipeline critics raised Wednesday's letter as a step forward, but said the governor still needs to call for a special legislative session or sign an executive order to address pipeline concerns.

Jane Kleeb, the executive director of the left-leaning group Bold Nebraska, said she was surprised by the announcement and hailed it as sign of growing opposition to the pipeline. But Kleeb said the governor also is trying to divert attention from the state's power to determine the pipeline route.

"We obviously are very happy that he's decided to side with Nebraska farmers and ranchers, rather than a foreign oil company," Kleeb said. "But there's an important distinction that needs to be made here. What he's leaving out is that the route of the pipeline is up to him."

Congressional lawmakers from both parties have written to the State Department arguing for and against the pipeline, but some of the strongest opposition has come from Nebraska, where the state's two U.S. senators have raised sharp questions.

Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson said Nebraska has had the opportunity for more than a year to weigh in on the Keystone proposal.

"If the governor doesn't like the route, he has the power to change it," Nelson said Wednesday. He noted Democratic state Sen. Ken Haar and others "are working to change the route, and I'd encourage the governor to work with them in exercising the state's rights."

Haar has called for a special session and said he is exploring options to prompt state action. He said the governor's letter "accurately reflects the opinion of most Nebraskans" who support the pipeline but oppose the proposed route.

U.S. Rep. Jeff Fortenberry, a Nebraska Republican, said he is urging a comprehensive federal review to address the line's potential impact on the aquifer and the ecologically diverse Sandhills.
