Daycare

He stated that the time is now to decide whether the commission wants to instruct city staff to draft an ordinance that could be voted upon in the future.

"It doesn't take the responsibility away from the parent. I'm still responsible to make sure I put my child in a safe environment," Carda stated. "I think, as a city, we could do a little bit more than what we are doing right now. I would like to see this ordinance move forward in some form."

Commissioner Nancy Wenande said that, despite most citizens telling her an ordinance is not needed, she still finds herself in favor of a licensing process encompassing some of the elements proposed by Voices for Children.

"Just like having a mobile home, peddler's license, transient license or even owning a dog or a cat — those are all items that need to be licensed within the community," she said. "I don't see where licensing a daycare should be an exception to that."

Just as in earlier discussions, however, a majority of the commission was skeptical of whether such an ordinance would be a good idea.

A couple of commissioners said that, if daycares are to be regulated, the state should expand its net. Currently, the state does not require daycares to register with the Department of Social Services unless they supervise more than 12 children.

"We're now (talking about) policing those that the state has chosen not to police for whatever reason," Mayor David Knoff said. "Wouldn't it be a better use of resources (for the state to regulate) when the state actually has the mechanism to police these kinds of daycares? Aren't they trained to do that sort of thing?"

City Manager Doug Russell was asked what kind of time commitment would be necessary from staff to do basic fire inspections.

"Right now, we don't do home safety inspections," he responded. "We don't have a means for responding if someone has a complaint about them. I think, to start off, we're going to at least need to hire one person."

Commissioner Charlie Gross responded, "I just think we're setting ourselves up for either more work than we realize or liability that I don't want."

A handful of daycare providers gave input to the commission during the discussion. A majority voiced skepticism of the need for an ordinance and said their daycares are inspected daily by their clients. Others said they did not want city government coming into their home and telling them what to do after running a successful business for years.

"It's a little frustrating sitting here listening to all of you fine people discussing our lives, our homes and our love of what we do when you don't really know what you're talking about — no offense," Sarah Anderson, a home-daycare provider, said. "If you even consider having all of us home-daycare providers register with the state, that's going to be a big problem. It's not because we don't want to be registered, but it's a lot of paper work and a lot of nonsense you don't need to take the time to do. My day is not filling out paperwork, it's playing with kids and taking care of them."

However, if the ordinance stuck to criminal background checks, CPR training and an annual fire code inspection, she said she could possibly support it.

Jennifer Bockholt of Stepping Stones Child Care Center recalled her experience as a young mother moving to Yankton, not knowing anyone and not knowing what questions to ask of a potential daycare provider. She believes the proposed requirements are needed.

"(This proposal is) not out there to pick on anybody," she continued. "It's to protect the kids who aren't in daycares like yours. It's just trying to protect our kids from the people who shouldn't be providing care."

Kettering told the commission that the minimum requirements would help assure the safety of children, no matter their socioeconomic status.

"It's not an issue for children who are well-cared for. It's not an issue for parents who ask the right questions. It's not an issue for people who have means to hire a good baby-sitter," she said. "It's an issue to make sure that all of our children — all of them that go to daycare providers — are safe. There are no guarantees in this world, but it's being proactive. I think being proactive is a lot better than being reactive."

Toward the end of the almost 90-minute discussion, City Attorney Dave Hosmer was asked about the risks of enacting an ordinance with the requirements being suggested.

"If there is a tragedy that occurs, somebody is going to get sued," Hosmer said. "The summary is that there is quite a bit of liability. It can be managed, but you have to manage it with personnel. The more you do, the more personnel you need. There are no in-betweens."

His response cooled the interest of some commissioners who may have been leaning toward support of having city staff work on an ordinance.

Even Wenande said that the proposal creates too much liability for the city in its current form.

"It's not that we don't care about the children that are in danger," said Commissioner Pauline Akland. "We don't have a good way to get a handle on it. I think there are other things we could do as a commission and as a city to find these daycares that are endangering the kids."
