However, last week the Press & Dakotan encountered a completely different dog. Lulu was at Yankton's Canine Grooming Center, where Barbara Steinberg, the other co-founder of DAR, spent months nursing the dog back to health after her quarantine. Lulu was running around, playing and basking in the attention of the woman who found her and has now adopted her.

"It's not the same animal," said the woman, who wished to remain unidentified. "It's a world of difference.'

She said Lulu has become part of her family, especially by winning over the hearts of a young granddaughter and another family

Steinberg said the outpouring of assistance from people who learned of Lulu's plight was overwhelming. DAR received approximately $2,500 to address her medical needs.

After the quarantine, Lulu had itchy, yeasty skin, and it was necessary to give her baths with medicated shampoo twice a week.

'We alternated two different medicated shampoos," Steinberg said. "I'd do one in the beginning of the week, and one at the end of the week. About every three days, she was getting a shampoo and two or three different kinds of medication. She started coming around.'

In those early days, Steinberg said Lulu seemed very sad. But, as time went on, that began to change.

"You could see her starting to come around," Steinberg stated. "I think she finally realized we were trying to help her." Lulu got used to the medication and bathing routine. "She started opening up and getting along with the other dogs," Steinberg said. "I started taking her home with me on the weekends." Lulu's fur has begun to fill in and the veterinarian doesn't believe there will be any long-term side effects from the neglect she endured.

"She has a dominant personality," Steinberg said. "She thinks she is the toughest dog. As long as the other dogs keep going about their business, she doesn't care. She gets along with everybody.

Lulu has been living with her adoptive family since the beginning of the month and is still on medication.

DAR currently has about a half-dozen dogs looking for families, Steinberg said. "Lulu's got a home," said her adoptive mother. "But homes, and there will be more to come. She praised DAR for the work the organization has done with Lulu and other

These women are angels," the woman said.

DAR is always looking for donations and foster homes so that it can continue its mission.

If you would like to assist, donations can be sent to Dakota Animal Rescue, PO Box 240, Yankton, SD 57078. You can also contact the organization at (605) 661-4519, or (605) 661-3121.

force to a peak of 101,000

by mid-2011. The U.S. troop surge was supposed to put so much military pressure on the Taliban that its leaders most of whom are in Pakistan — would feel compelled to come to the peace table. That hasn't happened. Preliminary contacts began, but have been stymied

When he announced his decision in December 2009 to send the 33,000 extra troops, Obama said it was aimed at seizing the initiative in a war that was "not lost, but for several years .. has moved backwards."

Battlefield momentum was regained but doubts persist about how long-lasting the progress will prove to be.

Stephen Biddle, a professor of international affairs at George Washington University and an occasional consultant to U.S. commanders in Afghanistan, said Monday he's grown more pessimistic about the handoff of security duties to the Afghans in 2014. "It looks like what we're going to be handing off is a stalemated war," he said in a telephone interview Monday, "which means the U.S. Congress will be asked to write these checks (to support Afghan forces) for years and years and years with no plausible argument that we're going to bring this to a successful conclusion, at least on the battlefield.' Troubling is piling up so rapidly that some analysts wonder where it will lead.

"We've had this series of unfortunate events, the grand total of which it's really hard to read in any remotely positive manner." said Douglas Ollivant, a former Army officer who served in Iraq during the 2007-08 American troop surge and in 2010-11 was the senior counterinsurgency adviser to the U.S. commander of the eastern sector of Afghanistan. He is now a senior fellow at the New America Foundation, a think tank.

Worries about Afghan soldiers and police turning their guns on their U.S. and allied partners have reached the point where Gen. John Allen, the top U.S. commander there, directed lower-level commanders on Sunday to review security protections

operations with the Afghans temporarily.

And it prompted Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to say Sunday that insider attacks have become a "very serious threat" to the war campaign. "Something has to change," he declared. He also suggested that the Afghan government needs to be more aggressive about making those changes.

But Defense Secretary Leon Panetta struck a different tone by saying Monday that the insider attacks are a "last gasp" by a weakened Taliban. Whatever the connection between these attacks, which so far this year have killed 51 allied troops — mostly Americans — and the Taliban, they were not a problem when the surge began.

In just the past three days there have been at least three insider attacks, killing two British and four American troops. The third attack, on Monday, wounded at least one civilian contractor but resulted in no fatalities. Obama also directed that the reinforcements start coming home by July 2011, and he ordered that all return by this month.

U.S. and coalition officials say the overall war plan remains on track, with Afghan forces taking more of a lead role in fighting the Taliban insurgency over the next two years. The combat role for international forces is scheduled to end in December 2014, although some thousands of troops are to remain in various support roles.
