How To Handle The Severance

BY DAVE RAMSEY

Dear Dave.

I'm an accountant, and my company is experiencing layoffs. I just learned that I'll be losing my job in four weeks. I'll receive a severance check, but I have no other savings set aside. Should I use some of the severance to pay off debt, or hold on to that money as long as I can? —Frank

Dear Frank,

I'd hang on to that money and pile up as much other cash as I possibly could. Right now, the most important worries are food. lights, water and shelter. Debt is not on the list. We need to take care of your basic survival needs first and make that money stretch as far as it will go.

There are two bright spots in this scenario. One, you know the wolf is going to be sniffing around the door, and that gives you time to prepare. The second thing is you're an accountant, and that's a very marketable skill. Lots of companies are going to be looking for your kind of expertise as we slowly turn the corner and come out of this recession.

Here's another thing. The better financial cushion you have during this time, the better you'll do when interviewing for other iobs. Things will be tight, but if you've saved and budgeted your money well, you won't come off as needy or desperate. You can be confident in your abilities to add value to a different company, instead of being all freaked out and begging for a job.

Then, once you're settled into someplace new, you can start writing checks out of the remainder of the severance money and your first couple of paychecks to catch up on things!

Dear Dave,

will make you each stronger and

The hard truth is this. We're all going to die some day. Anything you own, like the 401(k), has to stand good for what you owe when you pass away. In other words, the credit card debt would have to be paid before your husband or others received anything from your estate.

I appreciate your diligence and honor in wanting to make sure your debts are handled. But in this situation, so what if a credit card company has to wait a while to get paid? It will happen when it happens. Right now, you are the number-one priority.

College Starts Reaching Out To At-Risk Students

BY HARVY LIPMAN

HACKENSACK, N.J. — Suicide attempts are on the rise among three select groups of Americans: military veterans, gays and lesbians, and college-age males, federal statistics show.

Administrators know when lots of their students fall into those three group. And that's part of the reason Bergen Community College, in conjunction with the mental health non-profit Care Plus NJ, applied for a federal grant to establish a suicide prevention program on its Paramus, N.J., campus.

This month it was awarded $301,215 from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Service Administration to create the ter, part of the health and tor of the college's Wellness Cen-program.

"Those are groups that make up a lot of our student body," counseling program on campus. "We've done multiple mentalhealth programs with Care Plus over the last six or seven years, and we know from those programs that there's a great need," Pignatelli added. "Our counselors continue to see more students with mental-health concerns, although not all of them are suicidal of course.'

The new suicide prevention program will begin next month. Pignatelli said the idea behind it is to train 125 students and 15 staff over the next three years in "mental-health first aid."

Pignatelli and one of the center's counselors have already been trained. They, along with Care Plus staff, will conduct the sessions

The idea, she said, is to help identify mental-health problems before they turn into emergencies, and to help overcome the stigma many people feel about acknowledging they have mentalhealth issues.

65th Anniversary Celebration

Mr. & Mrs. Don and Dorothy Anderson

Don and Dorothy Anderson of Yankton, SD, will celebrate their

65th Wedding Anniversary with an Open House from 4:30-6:30pm

Saturday, October 6, 2012 at the Yankton Elks Lodge, 504 West 27th

The event will be hosted by their children: Steve (Patricia)

Anderson, Jackie (Jerry) Koster, Gail (Craig) Kennedy, Kevin (Julie)

Why focus so heavily on training students?

"Who do students talk to when they're feeling stressed? Other students," Pignatelli said. "Ninety percent of the people who die from suicide have a diagnosable, treatable mental-health disorder," added Carol Augustine, vice president of Care Plus' children and family division. "But people can only get treated if they come in and get help. There's this terrible stigma attached to mental-health disorders. A lot of people are embarrassed to acknowledge they need help."

That's where having student and staff trained to recognize and offer assistance comes into play, she added.

efforts make a difference." Augustine said.

That's why the program will be two-pronged," Pignatelli explained. "Part of it is educational, to train students and faculty in mental-health first aid. But it will also help us deal with that stigma, so that when people appear to be in emotional distress someone will be able to recognize that. They'll be able to refer them and help them overcome the embarrassment they feel in asking for help."
She added that another arm of the program will be to conduct surveys of students and then develop additional programs around the identified needs.
