Education

From Page 1

Education advocates and school officials have been petitioning legislators to address the teacher shortage. A group of education officials recently suggested creating a 1-cent summer sales tax to go toward increasing teacher salaries.

Legislators and the governor's office expressed mixed views about that idea.

Sly, House Education committee chairwoman, said a sales tax increase was a possibility but should probably go to a public vote.

Tony Venhuizen, a spokesman for Gov. Dennis Daugaard, said the governor has opposed raising taxes in the past and would be skeptical about the success of a proposal this year.

"There's a political reality," he said. "Not even his position, but would that be something that would be said. "It's funny sitting here listening to these contestants. Some come up and play a tune that makes you want to tap your foot. Others come up and play waltzes that make you want to cry. There is so much feeling in the music."

Though Foss is now 93, he still plays in three bands. He said that he will never stop making music.

Most recently, Foss and his wife received the Lifetime Achievement Award at the South Dakota State Fair.

"It made me feel wonderful!" Foss said. "I may not be that great of fiddler, but I did start this contest and I have inspired many young people to play the fiddle."

One of those people was Michelle Stein, who judged the fiddle contest.

"Wilbur has been a great inspiration to me," Stein said. "He sold me my first violin."

Stein said that Foss has been a great supporter of her musical journey since she was young. She has been judging contests for 10 years.

"It's so wonderful coming back here every year," Stein said. "It is like a big family reunion. I have adopted Wilber as my 'Fiddle Grandpa.'"

Stein says that she send Foss mail addressed to "Grandpa Foss" when she can't see him.

"He is just a very wonderful, inspiring man," Stein said.

YOUNG AND OLD

This weekend's fiddle contest was for young and old alike.

• Sophie Jansa, 12, from Sioux Falls was the youngest person at the contest this year. This is her second year competing. Last year, she won the Junior Junior.

"My favorite part about playing is just playing freely and not having other people judge you," Jansa said.

Jansa said that she also enjoys playing with her dad's band The Crabgrass Crew. She said that her dad took her on the journey of the fiddling.

"We are all in this together as a family," Jansa said.

Jansa said she wants to tell young fiddlers to keep practicing, even when it's hard. She said that it gets frustrating when she didn't get it right away.

"Once you get it and understand it, it is the best feeling," Jansa said.

• Danielle Gillis, 16, from Yankton was another young participant in the contest. She said that she started taking lessons when she was in second grade.

"I love the reaction I get when I play from other people," Gillis said.

She said the fiddle is very soothing for her to play.

"When I was away at summer camp for five weeks, which is the longest time I have ever been away from home, I was really homesick," Gillis said. "But I had my fiddle with me and it really made me feel at home."

Gillis placed first in the South Dakota Junior competition and fourth in the South Dakota Championship competition this year.

BROTHER VS. SISTER

Two siblings competed supported by the Legislature or by the public?"

Venhuizen and Rep. Tessa Hawks, D-Hartford, both said the state could look to funding like the Critical Needs scholarship that reward students who commit to teaching in critical areas of the state in exchange for tuition.

"I was a science teacher, so I was granted several loan forgiveness programs because I taught in a high-needs area in a high-needs school," Hawks said. "So expanding that to other fields of teaching would be a good start to creating some incentive programs for teachers."

Several also acknowledged that the state's role is important but limited. Staffing levels and salaries are determined at the local level, Venhuizen said.

"Particularly in some small districts we see they're making decisions to keep larger staffs, to keep their staffing levels higher rather than to use the money to pay fewer teachers more," he said.

against and with each other in this weekend's annual contest. Nikolaas Kooi, 17, and Meia Kooi, 15, from Inwood, Iowa, both said they had a great time in Yankton.

"It's a fun contest," said Nikolaas.

The two started fiddling five years ago because of their interest in bluegrass music and county music.

Meia said that the two learned the most from the more experienced players and each other.

"We play together a lot," Meia said.

Though siblings are usually competitive, the brother and sister said that they play just for fun.

This was their first year playing in the event.

In Twin Fiddling, the duo received second place. In the open junior class, Nikolaas received first and Meia received second.

LAST YEAR CALL

Foss announced during the competition that he thinks that 2014 will be the last year he sells his CD's and candy.

Foss has been selling his "treats" for more than 20 years. In past years, the profits from selling CD's and candy went to the contest and to endeavors such as providing nursing homes with his CD's.

During the competition, he recalled a couple of ladies who insisted on the aides playing his CD every morning.

"This made me so happy," Foss said.

He said that he wants to concentrate now on just giving his CD's for free to nursing homes across the country.

The results from this weekend's fiddle contest were:

• Button Accordion — First: Paul Bader; Second: Johanna De Groot; Third: Jorgen Nielson

• SD Junior — First: Danielle Gillis
