definitions of competitive and non-competitive events within a team's season.

The rule previously stated: "A student who is a member of a high school team may not participate in that particular sport during the "in-season" time period on an independent or non-high school team or as a member of any "All-Star" team, or completely unattached on an individual basis."

A violation was punished by loss of eligibility for the rest of the season.

The new rule states: "Athletes who have joined their high school cross country team may not participate in road races once the high school cross country season started as 'unattached individuals'; this would be considered to be a violation of the 'in-season' Participation Rule.

"It is permissible for a cross country team or members of said team to run in road races during the cross country season provided the following conditions are met:

"All athletes represent their school, which includes running in their team gear;

The event sponsors set up a division for high school cross country teams;

Teams have had two full weeks of practice; and

The event organizers complete "Event Sanctioning" paperwork through the SDHSAA office."

organization poses to their security and to their people," he said. "In order for this effort to succeed, the heavy buy-in we need from Arab countries in the region is critical. I think it gives credibility to America's efforts — and obviously we need help from the European efforts as well. I hope this is a broad coalition. But when it comes to putting the troops on the ground that can take back some of this territory, hold this territory, keep ISIS from getting a sanctuary where they can train, plan and execute terrorist attacks against other countries in the region in the United States, it is critical and ... having Arab countries involved in that is absolutely essential."

One regional country that has a common enemy in ISIS is Iran. As a result, some have speculated on the possibility of forming a partnership between the U.S. and Iran to fight ISIS.

Thune said he believed this strategy would be unwise.

"The Shi'a-Sunni split is so critical in that region of the world that involving Iran, I think, would convey the impression that we're taking sides in that conflict," he said. "Right now, we want to succeed and stamp out ISIS, but at the same time, we've got issues with the Assad government in Syria. Of course, Syria and Iran are both closely linked and tight in supporting each other. Both support Hezbollah in Lebanon, so there's all kinds of dynamics in that region of the world that make this a delicate undertaking. In my view, we ought to keep our eye on the big prize. Obviously we need to defeat ISIS — that's a near-term goal

— but then we have to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear capability."

THE NFL AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

A number of domestic violence incidents in the National Football League have raised the question of whether Congress will get involved as they did with Major League Baseball's drug and steroid scandals in the past.

Thune said, at the moment, Congress is watching to see how the league acts on the issue.

"There are some oversight responsibilities that Congress has and I think (congressional involvement) will depend largely on how the NFL handles this," he said. "They've launched their own investigation. They're involving (Robert) Mueller, the former FBI director, and hopefully they'll take this as seriously as they should. I wouldn't be surprised if there might be some oversight role that Congress plays at some point, but I'd be reluctant to suggest that or say we're at that point yet."

On the issue of domestic violence as a whole, Thune said it's important to encourage victims to come forward in order to curb the problem.

"The lot of it is just educating people about coming forward," he said. "It becomes easier to prosecute and I think you start setting some examples. There's laws on the books, obviously, today that need to be enforced, but I just think (there are) awareness and education efforts that are being made to elevate this issue and make it more (visible) in the public consciousness than it has been before is important."

Thune said, while less than ideal, the last couple of weeks have helped bring the issue of domestic violence to the forefront.

"It seems to me, if nothing else, these unfortunate incidents that have occurred in the NFL have done that," he said. "The American people are, more than ever, focused on this issue and the importance of combating it and ensuring it doesn't happen in American culture."

CLIMATE OF UNCERTAINTY

Monday was marked by a wave of protests by thousands around the world meant to raise the issue of global climate change.

Despite dire warnings from the scientific community, Thune said he believes the jury is still out on humanity's impact on climate.

"The climate's changing all the time," he said. "Human activity probably contributes to it — on what level isn't really settled. There's a belief human activity contributes to it, but to the degree that impact is occurring is an issue that gets pretty widely debated."

Thune said it's important to measure the cost of tackling the issue.

"I think that the real question is, 'What do we do about it and at what cost?'" he said. "That becomes the practical, real-world question about how we deal with an issue and try to promote policies that clean up our environment and lessen what the human impact of climate change may be, but not in a way that completely wrecks the economy. That's the balance we need to strike. I'm certainly sympathetic to the need for smart policies that focus on the issue, but also do it in a way that doesn't wreck the economy."

Numbers

in FTEs.

Meanwhile, South Dakota State University in Brookings saw an increase of just three students, and saw its FTEs decrease by .39 percent. Dakota State University had a decrease of 82 students, but only saw its FTEs decrease by .06 percent. Black Hills State University had 25 more students but lost 4.64 percent FTE students.

In all, there were 36,532 students enrolled in the six state universities, with an FTE count of 26,836.5, a decrease of .17 percent from 2013.

Jack R. Warner, executive director and CEO of the BOR, said that the biggest drop was seen in part-time student numbers at the university centers in Sioux Falls, Rapid City and Pierre. But that there was an increase of more than 1,100 more classes taken online.

Abbot added USD's numbers were hurt by that fact more than other universities based on the classes they offer at University Center and their availability on the Internet.

"As the Internet becomes more popular, students in Sioux Falls are more inclined to stay home and take a course by distance rather than take a class at the center," he said.

"We are certainly the one who lost the most at the University Center because our courses are much easier to teach by distance."

He explained that a history course, which is an example of a course USD teaches at University Center, is relatively easy to teach by distance when compared to a lab class.

"A student taking biology or math is more inclined to take it in person because of the lab requirement," Abbot said. "DSU teaches math and does very well with it. Students don't like to take math by distance because they think they need the in-person teacher."

Abbot said he was puzzled by the decrease seen in the number of transfer students and would be digging into the data to see if there was a reason for the drop. He also said his staff would be continuing USDs effort to bring in more students from out of state.

"One of the reasons for going to DI in sports was to play up all the programs across University; it was to become more of a regional destination," he said. "I didn't look up exactly what numbers of our students are from out of state, but I would guess it falls between 30-35 percent. Those students pay more than in-state students. That is a benefit to us. Also, a certain number of students who come here from other states stay here to live after graduating. I feel that is beneficial to us, as well."

He noted that the residence halls on campus are currently full, but doesn't believe that the school will be building new dorms in the near future.

"My sense is that the Board of Regents would be reluctant to allow us build a new dorm until we can demonstrate that we have significant growth on campus of our freshman class each year," Abbot said. "Our goal is to move from between 1,200-1,300 freshmen students to 1,500 freshmen students on campus. It won't be easy to do, but that is our goal."

When looking at graduate numbers, USD remained stable, Abbot said. He added that the economy plays a big role in the number of graduate students seen.

"This year, I think that our numbers are flat," he said. "When the economy gets strong, the numbers reduce a little bit. It is a known fact that when the economy is weak, the college graduate who has lost their job or been downgraded will go back to school. When the economy is strong, the students will take a break from their program."

Abbot said there are several programs that are seeing large growth, such as the nursing program, which moved from a two-year to a four-year bachelors program. In addition, he noted that the addition of new staff and a new master's degree in public health will continue to drive enrollment in the future.

"We were the only state that didn't have a master's in public health program," he said. "When you collaborate between the public health program and the fact that we have a new chair in computer science who is very interested in big data and how it affects public health issues, I am looking forward to see where that goes."
