Independent Group Rejects Mexican Gov't Case On 43 Missing

BY E. EDUARDO CASTILLO AND KATHERINE CORCORAN
Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — An independent report presented Sunday dismantles the Mexican government's investigation into last year's disappearance of 43 teachers' college students, saying the prosecutor's contention that they were incinerated in a giant pyre never happened and fueling the anger of parents who have gone nearly a year not knowing what happened to their sons.

Attorney General Arely Gomez, who was not in office during the initial investigation, said that in light of the report she would call for a new forensic investigation of the municipal garbage dump where the initial probe concluded the 43 were burned to ash beyond identification.

And parents of the students demanded a meeting with President Enrique Pena Nieto, whose reputation and popularity has been undermined by the case.

"We will not accept another lie from the government," said Blanca Nava Velez, mother of Jorge Alvarez Nava.

While the government said the Sept. 26 attack was a case of mistaken identity, the report said it was a violent and coordinated reaction to the students, who were hijacking buses for transportation to a demonstration and may have unknowingly interfered with a drug shipment on one of the buses. Iguala, the city in southern Guerrero state where that attacks took place, is known as a transport hub for heroin going to the United States, particularly Chicago, some of it by bus, the report said.

"The business that moves the city of Iguala could explain such an extreme and violent reaction and the character of the massive attack," the experts said in the report delivered to the government and the students' families during a public presentation, where some chanted "It was the state!"

The report means that nearly a year after the disappearance, the fate of 42 of the students remains a mystery, given the errors, omissions and false conclusions outlined in more than 400 pages by the experts assembled by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. Only a charred bone fragment of one of the 43 has been identified and it wasn't burned at the high temperature of an incineration, contrary to Mexican investigators' claims.

"We have no evidence to support where the disappeared are," said Carlos Beristain, a Spanish medical doctor on the team.

The report recommends that authorities rethink their assumptions and lines of investigation, as well as continue the search for the students and investigate the possible use of public or private ovens to cremate the bodies. It also recommends investigating the possible drug angle and who coordinated and gave the orders for the attacks — all unknowns nearly a year later.

Pena Nieto said via his Twitter that he has given instructions for investigators to take into account the findings of the report, which dealt another blow to the Mexican government in a case that has already brought international outrage and protests.

Gomez said in a statement that the report would be "fundamental to the investigation" and its findings analyzed. But she answered no questions, including about the involvement of federal forces in the attacks.

She was named in March to replace former Attorney General Jesus Murillo Karam, who led the initial investigation and concluded the students were incinerated.

The attack and disappearance of the 43 at the hands of officials became a pivotal moment in Pena Nieto's administration, which started fast out of the blocks three years ago with a series of key political and economic reforms. But the slow response to the case of the 43 and the implausibility of the government's version of the events eroded the credibility of his government.

Pena Nieto mentioned the case last week in his state of the union speech, acknowledging its role in Mexicans' disenchantment with and distrust of his government.

"This report provides an utterly damning indictment of Mexico's handling of the worst human rights atrocity in recent memory," Jose Miguel Vivanco, Americas director at Human Rights Watch, said in a statement Sunday. "Even with the world watching and with substantial resources at hand, the authorities proved unable or unwilling to conduct a serious investigation."

In point after point, the international team of experts said the government investigation was wrong about the nature of and the motive for the attacks. It is an indictment of Mexico's investigative procedures and conclusions, and cites key evidence that was manipulated or that disappeared.

Federal police and the military were aware of the attacks and present at some of the crime scenes, according to the report. While their involvement is unclear, at the very least they failed to intervene to stop widespread shooting of unarmed civilians.

The report says the detainees gave four versions of what happened, including that the students were incinerated at a municipal garbage dump in the nearby city of Cocula and their ashes bagged and dumped in a river.

future — to protect it to stay the same way it is now."

hit the fuel it needed to grow. "Because the bar closed at 8 p.m. (Monday) night, we are not sure how long it had been burning," Nygaard said. "But the ATF, County Sheriff and all of the fire departments are working to figure out how it started and when."

According to The Associated Press, the adjoining distillery contained 500 gallons of grain alcohol, which may have stoked the blaze.

Shawn Barrows, Sturgis' assistant fire chief, said firefighters attempted to get inside the bar but heavy heat and smoke forced them to battle the blaze from the outside in heavy winds, the AP reported.

"We tried making access through the west side walk-in doors, but they were locked," Barrows told the Rapid City Journal. "We came around to the front-side garage doors on the north side of the building and cut a hole in it to make entry to the building."

Nygaard said he has not had a chance to talk to Ballard as he was returning to South Dakota from the Full Throttle S'loonshine Distillery in Trimble, Tennessee, where the pair had been Saturday and Sunday.

Tsipras Warns Greeks Against Return To 'Corrupt' Past

BY DEMETRIS NELLAS

Associated Press

ATHENS, Greece — Former Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras said Sunday the upcoming national election is a battle between his "honorable" government of the past seven months and "the dark period of corruption, cronyism and power networks" that prevailed in previous decades.

Tsipras, leader of the left-wing Syriza party, said he is the best-placed to improve the bailout deal with Greece creditors which he himself agreed to in July and which he described as "open-ended" on several issues and subject to improvement through negotiations.

Tsipras was speaking at the Thessaloniki International Fair, where the government of the day traditionally outlines its economic program for the next year. But this year, an interim government is in power, after Tsipras and his coalition government resigned on Aug. 20, following the defection of dozens of lawmakers from his party.

Tsipras outlined a government program whose reformist agenda, on education, health, employment, the economy and the civil service, has been, with a few variations, echoed by previous governments but, with exceptions, never implemented.

To put his own progressive stamp on policies, Tsipras said his economic policy would be based on "strong government intervention, with (state) investment to redistribute incomes."

He also accused his conservative opponents of championing mass layoffs and flexible forms of work, while he would promote "collaborative social economy ventures with subsidized wage costs."

spraying), roadway maintenance (crack sealing, pothole repair, painting/stripping and signage) and identification of areas in need of total road reconstruction.

The draft, as is, includes the following section to delegate responsibilities:

Category 1 Activities (Corridor Upkeep):

- Along all identified roadway corridors, the city shall be responsible for all activities identified in Category 1. The City shall track the costs of Category 1 activities and bill the county on an annual basis (on what date) for that portion of the costs associated with maintaining roadways in the county's jurisdiction.

Category 2 Activities (Maintenance):

- Either party may complete work activities in Category 2. The party proposing to complete the work will notify the other party at least 10 days in advance of commencing work. Billing by either party for the work activities will be proportionate based on jurisdiction.

Category 3 Activities (Reconstruction):

- The City and the County agree that West City Limits Road (WCLR) and Ferdig Avenue will need to be reconstruct-
